2015, a year in review

The outburst of terrorism at the end of 2015, including the massacres in Paris and San Bernardino, plus threats of continued incidents in the future, dominated media coverage and defined the year. A December New York Times/CBS poll found 44% of those surveyed fear a terror attack in the next few months. Politicians are taking into account increased public anxiety over safety issues. Immigration has percolated to the top of public issues, as many argue the arrival of tens of thousands of newcomers appears to present a security threat.

The main trends we saw in 2015 include a continued decline of the influence of mainstream media due to tightened ad budgets and numerous free information/news sources, corporate “PR” departments under increased control of legal, marketing and financial, and the continued growth in the agency side of PR where about a dozen specialized areas like healthcare, tech and financial are growing. O'Dwyer's, focusing on such practices, published 692 pages in 2015 that included hundreds of profiles of the practices and trends in those specialized areas.

PR is growing as mainstream media declines because technology allows companies and institutions to contact potential customers directly via emails, corporate websites, digitized company publications and social media.

More media are carrying corporate-generated editorial-type copy as “native advertising,” agencies are becoming more skilled at creating “stories” that contain client messages.

There were many major events in the PR/media arena this year. The biggest story in the services sector was the December purchase for $841 million of UBM’s PR Newswire by Cision, owned by private equity firm GTCR. Also under the same ownership are Vocus and Gorkana. Cision, headed by Peter Granat, adds a legacy news dissemination service to its tech-based offerings which include low-cost PRWeb, the “world’s No. 1 news release service.”

The sale of Newsday, Cablevision and news12.com to French-owned Altice for $17.7 billion was a shock to those in Eastern Long Island where we have spent half the year for 30 years. Local media are weak enough without being under foreign ownership.

The dismissal of PRSA VP-PR Stephanie Cegielski on Monday, July 27 was a shock. She had been there three years and was promoted to VP after the sudden death of Arthur Yann on July 13, 2013. We think she has a case against the Society because she got the duties of Yann but only about half his pay. What did she do that was wrong? The Society is now searching for a VP-PR.

Thomas Delaney, a graduate of The Gallagher Report, Madison Avenue’s feisty investigative newsletter that folded in 1989, shocked us by suing Meredith Corp. (Better Homes & Gardens) Dec. 16 on charges of copyright violation of The Delaney Report, a weekly newsletter based in Tryon, NC. The 15-page suit, filed in New York’s U.S. District Court, recalls copyright charges against PRSA made by 12 authors in 1994. Crain’s, New York Times, Prentice-Hall, Wyle and other major publishers whose works were copied and sold refused to join the authors in a legal action.

A pleasant shock came from attending Fair Media Council’s annual “Connection Day” Oct. 23 at Briarcliffe College, Bethpage, L.I. Attendance of 500-plus included more than 50 reporters and editors, many from major New York City media such as NBC, CBS and Fox News. PR pros and media figures heard 100 speakers and rubbed elbows in a friendly atmosphere.

Reporters are flowing to the PR side. Gawker reporter Gabrielle Bluestone found two Pulitzer Prize winners who had gone to PR: Rob Kaznia of the Daily Breeze, Torrance, CA, joining the USC Shoah Foundation, and Natalie Craw韓off of the Post and Courier, Charleston, SC, to media relations at the county government. Journalists who went to PR were interviewed by reporters Michael Kaminer and John Bonazzo who asked what it was like. All were positive about their new jobs, stressing the creativity required and better working conditions. Among those interviewed were Deborah Solomon, ex-Wall Street Journal and Pulitzer Prize winner now with Finsbury; William Goss, ex-New York Times real estate editor now at Rubenstein Assocs., and Joe Checkler, ex-WJS, now at Peppercomm. Gorkana, a subsidiary of Cision, now has a regular feature on journalists switching to PR called “Moving to the Dark Side.”

Michael Kinsley, writing in the May 2014 Vanity Fair on the decline of news jobs, described a “content farm” in Maryland as “dozens of recent college grads — paid 75 cents an hour — who sat at their computers grinding out blog items while editors stood above them with whips.” He admits this was an exaggeration but likens the “farm” to the 19th century factories that minimized labor costs.

The Institute for PR compromised its mission with its CEO appointment of Prof. Tina McCorkindale of Appalachian State University. This turned the clock back on IPR’s 25-year quest to be independent of PR Society of America. McCorkindale, a Director of the Society-controlled Universal Accreditation Board, chaired its Educators Academy in 2013.

Ad blockers become industry nuisance

The use of ad blocking software, technology that allows users to bypass Internet advertisements, has surged in popularity, leaving digital media publishers at a loss for a solution. The rising popularity of ad blocking software could have a major financial impact on the digital advertising industry. By Jon Gingerich

The use of ad blocking software, technology that allows users to bypass Internet advertisements, has surged in popularity, leaving digital media publishers at a loss for a solution. A series of recent reports reveals just how widespread consumers’ use of ad blockers has become, and what challenges they pose to digital marketers and publishers today.

Digital Consumer Next, releasing key findings from its Consumer Ad Block Report, found 33% of consumers are at least somewhat likely to use ad blocking software within the next three months. It seems consumer antipathy toward Internet ads, much like reported ad load times, has grown. The DCN study reveals more than 70% of Internet users dislike ads that expand over digital content, 57% have noticed slower page loads due to ads and 68% are concerned about the idea of ads tracking their behaviors.

Worse, the challenges digital publishers face in wake of ad blocking software are somewhat compounded by an industry that seems mostly unsure about how to solve the problem.

A recent survey of U.S. digital publishing professionals conducted by Cxense and Editor & Publisher found more than half of digital publishers surveyed—52.8%—admitted they didn’t have a strategy in place for dealing with the issue of ad blockers. The survey also showed fewer than 17% of all respondents have software capabilities that gauge how many visitors use ad blocking software when visiting their sites, and about half — 45.4% — admitted they weren’t even sure if their company possessed the ability to do so.

While an industry answer seems elusive, the urgency in finding a solution could be illustrated by the notion that consumers’ increasing use of ad blocking software may already be having deleterious affects on ad spending.

Pivotal Research Group analyst Brian Wieser last week said long-term outlook for the ad economy in 2016 would be characterized by a “tepid pace” — around 3% — citing ad blocking as a reason. Wieser noted that brand marketers’ concerns about ad blocking could compel some to ditch the medium and turn to branded content as an alternative.

Meanwhile, a recent Magna Global report on international ad sales predicts banner-ad sales will fall in 2016 by about 2%, due to a proliferation of ad blocking software.

For years, consumers voiced their preference for advertising over a pay model for Internet content. Now that those solutions are the norm, consumers are doing anything they can to avoid those ads, which have exhibited increasing load time that drags down users’ Internet and drains cell-phone batteries.

While solutions proposed for dealing with the prevalence of ad blocking vary — from introducing paywalls, to friendly reminders to readers that ads fund the content they view, to employing technology that prevents users employing ad blockers from accessing sites — digital publishers face an enormous challenge balancing quality user content with commercial solutions that don’t repel those users.

In October the Tech Lab at the Interactive Advertising Bureau launched its L.E.A.N. Ads program, which is slated to gather input for the purpose of creating a series of proposed industry standards for digital advertising.

Digital Ad Revenues Set Record

Internet advertising revenues in the U.S. totaled $15 billion in 2015’s third quarter, signaling the highest quarter on record, according to findings released today by the Interactive Advertising Bureau.

These record revenues reveal a growth of 5% from 2015’s second quarter, and a massive 23% uptick in Internet ad spends during the same period in 2014, also a record at the time.

The findings arrived in the IAB’s latest Internet Advertising Report, a quarterly estimate of U.S. interactive advertising revenues. That report is compiled from data given to the IAB from companies that sell Internet ads.

“These landmark figures confirm marketers’ confidence in using digital to reach consumers,” said IAB president and CEO Randall Rothenberg in a statement.

A report released in December by Interpublic research firm Magna Global claimed U.S. ad gains this year were “entirely driven” by digital ad sales, and predicted that digital ads would see double-digit gains again in 2016, jumping 14.6%.
The survey, titled "Millennials at Work: Perspectives on Reputation," analyzed U.S. workers belonging to the Millennial, Generation X and Baby Boomers generations, and gauged the similarities and differences each place on reputation in the workplace.

The study found distinct differences in the qualities workers aged 18-34 consider important to maintaining good reputations at work, with a particular emphasis on the roles networking and socializing play in maintaining those reputations.

The survey indicates Millennials place a far higher emphasis on workplace reputations when compared to their senior colleagues. Nearly half of Millennials polled — 47% — said they think about their professional reputations "all or most of the time," almost twice the number of Baby Boomers — 26% — who admitted exhibiting the same degree of reputational anxiety. More than any other generation, 59% of Millennials believe a person's reputation is established within their first month on the job.

These beliefs continue outside the office. Millennials place a far greater emphasis on in-person interactions and socializing with coworkers during off hours than any other generation polled. More than a third — 34% — of Millennials surveyed believe meeting with colleagues outside the office can have a positive affect on someone's professional reputation, compared to 14% of GenXers and 15% of Baby Boomers. One in five Millennials surveyed — 20% — said not being social outside of work can serve as a detriment to someone's reputation, three times the number of Baby Boomers — 7% — who agreed with this.

"Hanging out with colleagues after work might have been a nice way to kick back for a Gen Xer, but for Millennials it's a critical component of building their 'rep' or 'brand' at work and they take it seriously," Leslie Gaines-Ross, Chief Reputation Strategist at Weber Shandwick said in a statement. "Our research shows that more than any other generation, Millennials believe that in addition to doing a good job, it's important to connect with colleagues to build their careers and create lasting impressions."

Perhaps not surprising, Millennials' use of digital media as a tool for enhancing professional reputation revealed more disparity than any other category in the survey. Millennials place a uniquely high value on using digital media as a means for projecting a positive reputation, with 12% claiming that being active on social media can help them build a good professional reputation, compared to 3% of GenXers and 4% of Baby Boomers. GenXers and Baby Boomers are also more likely to believe —73% and 72%, respectively — that their work reputations are more important than their social media reputations, while 70% of Millennials agreed to this. More than any other generation polled, 21% of Millennials find work and social media reputations to be equally important.

However, Millennials appear less aware about the perils of workplace gossip than their senior peers. Only 64% of Millennials stated that they believe making negative statements about coworkers could potentially damage their own reputations, a contrast to the 74% of GenXers and 79% of Baby Boomers who believe this. By contrast, more Millennials than any other generation — 37% — believe that being too competitive can damage one's professional reputation, compared to only 29% of GenXers and 28% of Baby Boomers who agreed to this.

Millennials this year surpassed GenXers as the most represented demographic in the U.S. workforce, according to a recent Pew Research Center analysis of U.S. Census Bureau data. More than 53 million Americans — about a third of all U.S. workers — now belong to the generation.

The Weber Shandwick/IPR survey was conducted with KRC Research, and consisted of online interviews with 600 employed U.S. adults. ©

Crisis preparation in a digital age

Crisis communication has changed from a primarily reactive tactic, to one that requires speed and proactivity. While some crises will always be unpreventable, social media can empower brands to mitigate damage when dealing with the unexpected, and eliminate threats before they emerge.

Henry Kissinger once said, “There cannot be a crisis next week. My schedule is already full.”

Who knows how that tongue-in-cheek declaration turned out, but those certainly aren’t words to live by, especially for PR professionals.

Social media has leveled soapboxes. Now, any average Joe with a blog or social account and a handful of rabid followers can tarnish your brand.

Influence has evolved and so too must crisis communications. Once predicated on reactionary measures, successful crisis communication now requires an equal dose of proactivity.

Crisis emerge suddenly and move across country lines at the speed of a retweet. Perhaps many communicators assume crises strike only highly visible brands or ones in volatile industries. Don’t be fooled. Crisis has no regard for your field, plans or goals.

The good news is modern technology empowers brands to cut down threats before they emerge and mitigate damage should the unexpected strike.

A stitch in time

Crisis doesn’t always involve a C-Suite scandal or dysfunctional products. It can start from a simple miscommunication between buyer and sales rep.

Social media is the 21st century outlet for frustration, especially for those betrayed by brands.

Nearly a third of those who contact brands on social media expect a response within 30 minutes, and 57% expect the same response time at night and on weekends. Even the biggest-budgeted brands will have difficulty meeting those expectations without the proper resources.

Too many rely on just a human touch instead of investing in social listening software. Though PR professionals often disagree about strategy, nearly all (89%) give a thumbs up to social media listening. Despite this, only 37% use the tactic.

Social listening provides advantages in product development, content creation, media pitching, sentiment analysis, and undoubtedly other areas that pioneering brands will identify as the technology saturates the market. Social listening’s role in crisis communication, though, cannot be understated.

It provides 24/7 coverage and eliminates the tediousness and imperfections of manual searches. By searching for keywords—such as your brand’s, products’ and services’ names, related industry topics and common misspellings of each—you will have the pulse of your audience, enabling you to interject, solve issues and mitigate damage.

You can only control your reactions

Even the best proactive measures can’t stop all crises from emerging. This is the time to react with quick, precise and informed communication.

Create a plan that empowers specific individuals to handle specific crises. Lay out who gives final sign off and how long they have to do so. Waiting to mitigate crises only fans the flames.

Include backups, practice and learn from successes and mistakes. The flu or “we’ll do better next time” won’t satisfy an answer-hungry executive. Preparedness helped Scott Peacock, Public Relations Manager of Visit North Carolina, navigate an unusual and scary crisis.

After a series of shark bites off the North Carolina coast, Peacock, as part of the state’s division of tourism, found himself in “full-blown crisis mode.” The media sensationalized the story and news spread fast on social media. Contributing to the turmoil, the crisis overlapped with the 40th anniversary of “Jaws” and National Geographic’s “Shark Week.”

“Some were two weeks before, but never this many in this short time frame and with so many unknowns.”

More than consistent communication, brands need to collaborate with media during crisis just as they would during relative peace. That means helping reporters accurately tell the stories that they have planned.

For Visit North Carolina, many reporters focused on the impact on the state’s tourism revenue. Peacock became a go-to resource, acquiring and synthesizing the data they sought and eventually showing that revenue actually increased because many vacationers spent more time at beachside attractions, restaurants and shops instead of spending the day in the ocean.

Brands shouldn’t rely solely on the media to tell the story, though. They should share their own story, but using only factual information, not spin or half-truths, remains vital.

Peacock and staff assuaged fears by creating content about beach safety that covered everything from sunburn prevention to rip currents and shark bites.

“We didn’t want to create just a shark safety page because that would just exacerbate the issue,” Peacock said. “It covered what we needed (in terms of shark safety), but it wasn’t the focal point of the content.”

Visit North Carolina serves as a model for any brand dealing with crisis, but it wasn’t all hustle and know-how that got them through. Data drove its communication strategy, allowing them to identify the specific paths for handling this situation.

With social listening and media monitoring data, Peacock learned that media coverage of “shark bites” and “shark attacks” was higher than in the previous three decades. It also showed how closely related North Carolina’s beaches were to those terms.

“That’s what really drove the strategy,” Peacock said. “Data is huge. I know not everyone has access to the best monitoring software out there, but whatever you do have access to, make sure you mine it, comb through it and most importantly listen to it.”

A true recovery?

No brand wants to find itself embroiled in controversy, but only the foolhardy will avoid planning for it. By adding proactive measures, building blueprints for crisis procedures and making data-driven decisions, your brand will protect its image, recover from negative incidents and engender goodwill with the public.

“To fully recover, it comes down to transparency, honesty and trust,” Peacock said. “Bad things happen to good organizations, but it’s those three key areas and how you utilize them that determine whether you will make or break.”

Managing the cybersecurity threat

The likelihood of being victim to a cybersecurity attack isn’t a matter of if, but when. Given the reputational fallout that can occur when organizations fail to manage a crisis, preparation is critical. Here are some tips for surviving the inevitable.

By Heather Wilson

Nearly half of all Americans had their data exposed through cybersecurity breaches in 2014, according to the Ponemon Institute. Breaches come in many forms, from hacktivist groups who are motivated by political or social purposes; to state-sponsored entities that are well-funded, highly sophisticated and whose aim is usually corporate espionage, or in some cases, seeking control over critical U.S. infrastructure; to organized crime rings that seek data for financial gain; to an organization’s own employees. In fact, according to a recent Experian study, 54% of cybersecurity breaches in 2014 were caused by employees (either accidentally or maliciously).

Even a limited breach can cost a company millions in lost revenue, profit and reputation.

Prepare for it

This is not just an IT problem. Preparing for and managing a cybersecurity incident needs an intra-disciplinary approach. The first step is the creation of a crisis management team comprising senior members from legal, PR, HR, operations, security and IT (and perhaps other relevant departments depending on the organization).

This group should be formed during “peace time” so that it can establish roles and protocols well before any threat arises. Waiting until a crisis strikes will only result in more chaos and confusion over responsibilities and the loss of valuable time needed to assess what occurred and how to remedy the situation. During an actual cybersecurity incident, the crisis management team will serve as the liaison to senior management and other key stakeholders to ensure that the company can maintain business as usual while this smaller team focuses on the problem at hand.

In addition, the crisis management team needs a communications playbook that covers cybersecurity incidents along with other traditional potential crises. This plan must be short to be effective; in fact meticulously trying to map out a blueprint for managing an anticipated incident can be counterproductive because events rarely unfold the way we expect them to. To be effective, the plan must focus on guiding principles and goals to help the organization best communicate during times of crisis. By having this work done in advance, the crisis team, and the broader organization, is better able to maintain an orderly process throughout a crisis.

Once the playbook has been drafted, it is important to practice it. The team should hold a cybersecurity crisis drill to rehearse its roles, think through key messages and stress test the plan to see if there are any steps or items that might need to be added or rethought. The best drills include as many life-like elements as possible, including mock social media chatter, reporter and public official inquiries and angry customer comments.

Get help

Should a cybersecurity breach occur, bring in expert outside counsel. Companies should engage outside legal counsel and forensic investigators within 24 hours of an incident to perform the internal investigation. This will demonstrate that the company is taking the matter seriously. Even the largest of organizations often lack the specific expertise and resources needed to carry out the number of activities that need to be taken when a breach occurs.

Cybersecurity incidents, especially if personal or financial information has been exposed, can also open up a company to potential litigation and regulatory investigations. Bringing in outside help quickly can preserve evidence and will demonstrate to regulators, policy makers, customers, the board, shareholders and other stakeholders that the company is taking the appropriate steps to contain and manage the breach.

Some of the first questions that the crisis team and outside experts will want to ask are:

- What has been compromised?
- How many people may have been affected?
- What states/countries do they live in? (Notification laws vary by geographies.)
- How was that data stored?
- Has the hole that the hackers discovered been closed? Are there other ways they could get in?
- How can we contact those affected?
- Has law enforcement been notified?

If the suspects are employees or ex-employees, what information do we have about them? Were background checks done?

Going forward, what changes will be made to secure data or change procedures?

Communications considerations

During the early hours of a cyber crisis, you will not have all the facts. Until the investigation is complete, it is unwise to provide estimates or speculate on the breach’s origination and extent of potential damage caused. If the breach is especially large, high-profile rumors may already be circulating on social media (and in many cases the stories may be started by the hackers themselves, especially if the breach was caused by hacktivists). If the information you provided publicly before fully confirming the size and scope turns out to be wrong, it will undermine your credibility and make it appear that you do not have control of the situation. What you should communicate is that the organization is taking the matter seriously and will take care of those affected by the incident. Those individuals who may be affected are your chief concern.

Additional steps include:

- The legal and PR teams will work together to craft all messaging for the incident, as well as potential customer letters informing them of the breach. Communications materials should include language that can be used both internally and externally and versions appropriate for social media (should the need arise).
- Arm your front-line employees (receptionists, customer service, etc.) with talking points about the incident. Ensure that they do not “go off script” or speculate.

Initiate media, social media monitoring

While avoiding a cyber-attack altogether may not be realistic, being prepared to handle it is. In a 24/7 digital age, organizations no longer have the luxury of waiting to figure it out on the fly. Any misstep will be amplified instantly. Demonstrating leadership and control of the situation will help an organization through the crisis. By taking the time to do the prep work, organizations can better withstand a cybersecurity crisis with their reputation and business intact.

Social media in a crisis: to respond or not to respond?

When a corporate crisis occurs, should a company respond on social media, or remain silent? As is often the case in complex situations, the answer usually lies somewhere in between.

If a company monitors diligently for online conversation, it has an opportunity to respond quickly and contain potential issues before they expand. Sometimes, however, the right strategy is to ignore the chatter until it dies down. In such cases, responding can actually expand the reach of a crisis unnecessarily.

Below are two very different examples of social media response to a recent crisis, and the lessons one can learn from each: Each strategy arrives with a level of risk, of course, so deciding how to approach a situation always requires careful consideration.

To respond on social: REI

Strategy overview: Sporting goods company REI received negative attention after a social media crisis in November 2015. Because the crisis occurred on social media, REI responded on social media. This strategy was successful: REI was able to contain the negative conversation within only the affected community.

The crisis: In November 2015, REI announced that it would close on Black Friday (presumably, engaging in sporting events). Then REI CEO Jerry Stritzke held a question and answer session on social media discussion forum Reddit. The company’s “Opt Outside” campaign otherwise had been received favorably, so it likely anticipated the Q&A would have the same reception. It did not. In fact, the forum opened floodgates of criticism from REI employees. They complained that their success at the company was too dependent upon membership sales. A conversation that previously had been taking place behind closed doors was made public for all to see. The number of negative comments grew dramatically: from 300 to over 5,000. After the session ended, Stritzke posted a response on Reddit, the same forum in which the conversation took place. An excerpt of his post follows: “... I want you to know we’re committed to this community and to being honest about REI. I see a lot of value in hearing from our employees and members in a candid and anonymous setting like this. Thank you for the good conversation and holding us accountable.”

This conversation spilled over onto REI’s Facebook page, where more comments collected. REI’s Facebook team responded in real time, pointing users to Stritzke’s response, and thanking them for their feedback. Again, REI maintained its strategy of responding to the issue in the same channel where it originated.

Lessons learned from REI: Because REI’s crisis occurred on Reddit, the company responded there. When the conversation expanded to Facebook, REI also responded on this forum. By closely watching the level of discussion and continuing its normal course social strategy on other channels, REI did not communicate about the matter more broadly. Although the crisis certainly did spark mentions on several online news sites, overall, conversation about REI did not increase for long. Its strategy of containing the relevant conversation to the channels where it originated appears to have paid off.

Not to respond on social: GE

Strategy overview: GE dealt with a recent crisis without acknowledging it on social media. Instead, during the days that followed the crisis, GE paused its own social media activity. The strategy proved to be advantageous. The media cycle was short, and talk of the crisis on social media was limited.

The crisis: In April 2015, a fire destroyed six acres of GE’s Appliance Park manufacturing facility in Louisville, Kentucky. An investigation followed. When findings were released at the end of July, it became clear that GE’s outdated sprinklers and broken hydrants may have caused some of the damage.

In the days following the crisis, GE stopped posting its usual amount of social media content. After discussion related to the fire died down online, GE resumed posting normal course content. Its large suite of content helped steer discussion about the company back on track with little more than a brief pause. GE maintains a massive online presence, churning out positive articles, websites, and social media posts which dilute any negative discussion and dominate search results.

Lessons learned from GE: By watching the conversation and responding on a reactionary basis, GE was able to discern that it was not necessary to address the fire through its social platforms. Instead, it was able to limit the damage and exposure of bad news. It accomplished this even though it stopped posting on social media in the days following the crisis due to its strong, long-term digital presence. While it is always necessary to communicate news of a crisis with affected and relevant groups, the means to do so must be carefully thought through.

Corporate social media handles may not be the best means to communicate unless warranted by conversation happening there.

Key takeaways

Although GE and REI handled their respective crises differently, several principles were present in both companies’ responses.

First, monitor social media at all times. In a crisis, judge response strategy based upon the location and level of conversation.

Second, like any crisis, attempt to contain conversation within the affected communities. Respond to social media chatter on the same platform or channel in which it originated.

Finally, a strong digital footprint, including a long-term presence on social media channels, can prevent negative discussion from dominating online.

By formulating a strategy built upon these principles, companies can successfully navigate social media in a crisis.

Crisis Averted
Crisis in an age of instant gratification

Smart, effective communications are fraught with challenges in an era where technology compels us to share everything and respond without thinking.

By Ronn Torossian

Communication has never been easier or faster. While that is a helpful development in terms of sharing important news far and wide, expansive communication can also be problematic for a number of reasons. Not every news item should be forwarded, nor should every tweet be retweeted. A few simple but solid communication strategies can help to prevent miscommunication in an age of instant gratification facilitated by social media.

Fast and easy communication
Brands can now communicate almost effortlessly with consumers around the globe. All it takes is a few keystrokes on a phone, iPad, or computer, and a message arrives at its destination in a matter of seconds. Chat, videos, and photos are proliferating and traveling at unprecedented rates to almost anywhere on the map.

Internet technology and mobile phone service have made their way into the far north regions as well as into the depths of tiny villages in remote desert or jungle locations. While not every area has access to these services, countless numbers do, and coverage is growing daily.

Not only can these communication strategies be shared with friends and relatives instantaneously, personal pictures and mindless comments are now posted with intensity and ferocity on numerous social media websites for the world to see.

While we used to worry about the neighbors next door catching us sunbathing in the backyard or overhearing an argument, millions of people now air their most private thoughts and images with billions of strangers. This incredible shift has happened so rapidly that few consider the actual or potential ripple effect.

A casual glimpse at online news outlets reveals not only the latest events but also random comments from viewers who may or may not be who they claim to be. We cannot be sure who is posting the comments, nor can their opinions be validated facts before responding to a crisis situation. It is important to consider the logical approach to crisis communication facilitated by social media.

When not to speak up
Consumers like to share happy news like birth announcements and party invitations as quickly as possible. Brief updates or news tips are also frequently sent. As quickly as they are sharing happy news, they are also sharing questions, issues and complaints. There are certain situations when it is best not to speak immediately, but rather to wait and decide if a response is truly needed, and if so, what to say, and how, as well as when. A protocol for how to react is imperative.

Don’t respond to rumors or gossip
Be guarded when joining a conversation that circulates messages based on rumors, speculation, or hints. All too often, discussing unfounded facts has a way of coming back to bite you when it becomes known they are false or at least misinterpreted. Anyone who sends messages like these begins to lose the trust of those who read the posted messages. Credibility is compromised. Resist the temptation and wait for the facts to become manifest.

Don’t insult or confront others
Public communication is not the place for targeted conflict. If the issue is with an individual, handle it directly and privately. Throwing verbal darts on social media is in poor taste. It makes the sender look worse than the one at whom they are directed. Public disagreements often encourage others to get involved. Look to diffuse the situation and share the facts about your brand.

Take a beat
Never respond to comments immediately. Chances are you’ll say something that you’ll regret later. Wait until you have all of the facts before responding to a crisis situation. Many accounts can be given of incidents where someone posted a picture or comment that affected others adversely through personal interaction or forwarding of wrong information. With communication widely accessible at any time, people are interacting for all to see.

Despite our growing dependence on the Internet for most of our daily activities like checking the news, monitoring finances, and communicating with others, it should be used cautiously as a medium of interaction and a source of information. The Web is rife with inaccuracies and misinformation. Everyone who uses the Internet should remember to sift information carefully in search of truth, and to validate facts whenever possible. With the current speed of transmissions, much of what we read is unreliable.

After receiving inflammatory social media comments, it is important to refrain from responding in a knee-jerk manner. If you must share your thoughts, have a protocol in place outlining steps on how to react.

The Internet has made communication accessible to almost anyone for any purpose. It is up to each individual to use communication responsibly. Self-control in an age of self-gratification is essential in many aspects of daily life, including social media. Take time to sift spontaneous communication thoroughly before responding to avoid overreacting or misrepresenting the facts, intentionally or otherwise.

Discretion now will prevent regret later. Ronn Torossian is CEO of 5WPR.

Sitrick aids Millennium in Chap. 11

Drug testing lab Millennium Health, which overbilled the federal government by more than $250 million, is working with Sitrick and Company on its pre-packaged Chapter 11 bankruptcy.

The San Diego-based company filed for bankruptcy protection Nov. 10 in a bid to restructure and cut $1.15 billion in debt. Millennium Health, one of the country’s largest drug testing labs, in October agreed to pay $256 million for billing Medicare, Medicaid and other federal health programs for unnecessary drug and genetic testing. The company also copped to giving gifts to doctors in exchange for referrals, reported the Wall Street Journal.

Among its debt is $206 million in its Justice Dept. settlement.

Crisis management predictions for 2016

Looking ahead at 2016, it’s worth taking note of what occurred in the world of crisis management during the last year. An increased response time, a pronounced role of data, a need for companies to commit to change, and a penchant to plan for the unexpected will all play greater roles next year.

By Louise Harris

In 2015 we saw prominent CEOs lose their jobs, stocks plunge and reputations left in tatters. Airlines, banks, car companies, retailers, restaurant chains, pharma companies, dating sites, fantasy football and even the governing body of international football found themselves under attack. What’s especially astounding is how so many companies — even those aided by crisis veterans — found themselves caught badly off guard.

This also meant grappling to respond in real time to questions and threats from activists, internal whistleblowers, cyber hackers, disgruntled employees, outraged customers and government watchdogs all under the glare of a relentless 24/7 global news cycle.

So, what lessons can we learn from this and what can we expect in 2016? Here are six top predictions:

Scenario planning will need an overhaul. Who could have predicted the Volkswagen emissions cheating scandal? Was that ever a factor in VV’s scenario planning? Crisis managers will need to re-examine their potential vulnerabilities and think carefully about not only what could happen, but also what couldn’t possibly happen. It’s time to consider highly unlikely scenarios and prepare for the unexpected. It is uncomfortable to consider the possibility of your CTO involved in fraud or your retailer putting a cheaper, fake product on shelves, but managers will need to get comfortable with the uncomfortable and trust no one person fully.

Crisis manuals will live on and offline. Recently, crisis management plans have moved away from manual versions, to shorter, increasingly mobile plans, accessible anywhere, anytime and housed on the cloud. This makes sense in the always-on crisis world, where timely response is critical.

So, what happens in the event that your entire network goes down? When Ted Koppel asked Janet Napolitano, former secretary of homeland security about the chances that someone will knock out a significant part of the power grid, she responded, “Very high — 80%, 90%.” The possibility of a cyber-attack on any company’s network is highly probable. At a minimum, having a printout of key contacts and steps to take on-hand will be critical.

Data analytics will increasingly be used to track and predict threats. We hear a lot about “big data” and “predictive technology,” but corporations today really do have some ability to look around the corner to forecast what’s going to hit them and deflect the punch. Imagine if you could see a social media spark and stop it from becoming a fireball. The amount of data available is staggering. With the rise of Natural Language Generation, we will be able to make sense of all that data, create reports in minutes and respond more quickly than ever before.

Consumers will become less trusting and more fearful. According to a New York Times/CBS news poll, Americans are more fearful of a terrorist attack now than any time since just after 9/11. With recent world events, people will be increasingly fearful of riding the subway, handing over their credit card or buying a car.

On top of that, there are growing alarms around everything from processed food and antibiotic-resistant bacteria, to spontaneously combusting hover boards. Brands will need to work even harder to build and maintain trust and credibility through clear, transparent and authentic engagement.

And when things go wrong, the “mea culpa” apology will no longer be enough; corporations will need to show that things are genuinely going to change.

Comedy will feature more in crisis. Just a few months ago, on Last Week Tonight, John Oliver managed to use humor even when he covered the horrendous Paris attacks on his show. Comedians, such as John Oliver and Stephen Colbert as well as YouTubers and other Internet influencers, will continue to poke fun at corporate and personal misdeeds for entertainment. But, brands can also look to use humor to provide perspective and prevent issues from escalating.

Response times will need to be on steroids. According to a recent Freshfields study, the majority of crises were visible within 39 minutes, whereas it took an average of 21 hours for companies to respond. This means that for 20 hours, these companies’ reputations were being shaped by others and rarely favorably. As the virality of the Internet speeds the spread of information, companies need to respond to allegations and developments within the first twenty minutes to ensure their voice is heard.

Speed and good judgment are essential to have any control over a story with updates shared almost in real time. Silence will very rarely be golden in 2016. Chances are that others will have the facts at the same time as — if not before — you. Think of the first responder, the government official, your receptionist and the bystander filming on his phone and posting to Twitter — how can we be one step ahead?

Getting the response to a major issue “wrong” in 2016 could have enormous repercussions on reputations as well as on a company’s bottom line. The same Freshfields study showed that 53% of corporations who experienced a crisis had not seen share value recover to pre-crisis levels even a year after their initial problem.

So what is going to drive a successful response to a reputational threat in 2016? In the words of veteran TV journalist Ted Koppel, we need think the unthinkable. And plan for it.

Washington and crisis, a unique relationship

Crisis communications and Congressional hearings are inevitably intertwined, proving the adage that the most dangerous place to be in Washington is between a politician and a TV camera.

By Michael W. Robinson

The recent testimony by Volkswagen Group of America President and CEO Michael Horn is a case in point. In addition to the inevitable picture of the witness raising his or her right hand to be sworn in — and yes, the committee does this on purpose — he initially hit the right notes before going flat.

The New York Daily News captured the scene perfectly: “While under oath, Horn admitted that the illegal software installed in the TDI-models produced between 2009 and 2015 were ‘for the express purpose of beating tests,’ as it was phrased by Rep. Tim Murphy, a Republican from Pennsylvania. ‘It was installed for this purpose, yes,’ Horn said. This isn’t a surprise given the repeated apologies from Volkswagen higher-ups, including Horn, but it’s still nice to hear it stated so resoundingly.”

But then, under the sub-head, “Execs pass the buck,” the News continued: “Horn claimed Volkswagen’s top officials had nothing to do with the emissions tampering. ‘This was not a corporate decision,’ Horn said, instead placing the blame on ‘a couple of software engineers’ who he said installed the software.”

Unfortunately for VW, the company failed to observe some primary tenets of navigating a public affairs crisis: 1) You can’t defend the indefensible, and 2) The words “I am sorry” and “we apologize” are necessary prerequisites for any senior executive to utter before anything else he or she says will be heard.

Indeed, the reality is that companies and high profile individuals who are subject to the Beltway Kabuki Theater do not always have to come across as the wrongdoer. In fact, with advance planning, careful preparation, and the right communications strategy, organizations can pierce through the background noise and articulate their own narrative when faced with a high profile public affairs crisis situation. Specifically:

1. Engage in realistic and comprehensive scenario planning. The Pentagon calls it their “Red Team” — a vertically-integrated unit that forecasts the worst-case scenarios precisely so that the appropriate courses of action, leaders, and materials can be aligned ahead of time. Take the time to really imagine what could go wrong (not just an oil spill, but one that is from the underscored well that doesn’t stop, for example). And keep in mind that the larger the organization, the more important it is to engage in this practice at corporate headquarters, in operating divisions, and out in the field.

2. Deeply understand the organization. Know its business, culture, and stakeholders (internal and external) in order to create the right system so that the right information gets to the right people at the right time, and decisions can be made accordingly. Often, it is helpful to get outside assistance to bring a fresh eye to this analysis.

3. Get the tone of the messages right. Understanding that in the event of a major crisis, the notion that a multi-billion dollar company is the victim simply won’t fly. That is especially true when it comes to data breach and cybercrime. From Target’s 2013 breach to the revelation last year that the Office of Personnel Management’s (OPM) systems had been exploited, large organizations are expected to have the right safeguards in place.

4. Practice, drill, and rehearse. Disasters that are well-handled from the beginning are generally not those that attract media and Congressional interest. Knowing that, companies should commit to annual (or, even better, biannual) crisis exercises. Bring in outside facilitators and be ready to experience the time-compressed lifecycle driven by Twitter, Facebook, 24x7 cable coverage in 2016. Make flexibility part of this practice, understanding that what you know in Hour One on Day One, will be wrong (or, at least, out of date) by Day Two. And to be effective, force disagreements during these drills (CEO v. Chairman or General Counsel v. Marketing), so that they can be understood and resolved in advance.

5. Measure the tangibles outcomes as well as the intangibles. Ask as many questions as possible to evaluate your team’s readiness for the real thing. How did the company do in this simulation? Were decisions made quickly enough, with the right messages? Is the crisis team too big/too small/just right? Do members of the team know their roles and are the teams in the field equally prepared?

Once a Congressional hearing has been announced, or even if individual Members have taken to social media to raise the issue, companies often feel a sense of paralysis. But there is no need for that. In fact, companies do have resources at their disposal and should use them. This includes:

1. Be proactive in telling your story. You know it best and nobody else is going to help you until you begin to come to your own defense.

2. Recruit and deploy supporting third parties who can provide business, economic, statistical, legal, and other critical analysis in your favor. And be sure they are honest about their relationship with you.

3. Embrace transparency. Too many companies in Washington have, over the years, funded Astroturf organizations (essentialy, sock-puppet advocacy groups) to defend them. Be proud to tell your story.

4. Engage in social media and with new digital outlets. It’s coin of the realm in politics today, an instant opinion poll if you will. A December 2015 Pew Research Center study found that: “reporters for niche outlets, some of which offer highly specialized information services at premium subscription rates, now fill more seats in the U.S. Senate Press Gallery than do daily newspaper reporters. Also increasing in number are reporters for digital news publishers — some of which focus on niche subjects, others on a broad range of general interest topics. In 2009, fewer than three dozen journalists working for digital-native outlets were accredited to the Press Gallery. By 2014, that number had risen to more than 130 — roughly a four-fold increase.”

Not unlike business interruption insurance or D&O policies for board members, companies that make an investment today in planning for tomorrow will reap the benefits many times over.

The November elections, the August Summer Olympics, and one or two Congressional hearings are all events that can be calendared now. For the corporate executive who ends up under the klieg lights in that hearing room, so too should the preparation.

Crisis planning for the Greek life

Fraternal organizations on America’s college campuses are as old as our country itself. From “Animal House” to “Neighbors,” the image of fun-loving and risqué Greek life has been reinforced in pop culture and has provided much comic relief. But perhaps never before have fraternities and sororities been the center of such unwelcome attention.

Recent incidents involving the hot-button issues of race and campus sexual assault have put Greek life under a microscope.

For all the good these organizations do — creating a sense of community, fundraising for important causes, and forging lifelong friendships — it is often the poor choices that undergrids that fraternities and sororities are most often recognized for. Racist, misogynistic and downright criminal conduct are a reminder that Greek leadership must remain vigilant to protect both their members and their reputations.

There was a time not too long ago when knowledge of this bad or offensive behavior remained confined to the frat or sorority house. That’s no longer the case, of course, with many Greek organizations having thousands of active members, each operating multiple social media channels.

While the exposing or “outing” of obsessive rituals has contributed to progress and more responsible behavior, we all know that a few rotten apples can spoil the bunch. In the world of 24/7 social and online media, it doesn’t take much for the entire chapter or its national organization to be painted with a broad brush. While it may not be fair, no one in Greek life should be surprised.

The UVA/Rolling Stone saga is a cautionary tale of how vilifying the entire Greek culture is an overly simplistic and potentially dangerous approach. Even so, today’s collegiate landscape presents new realities. Awareness that one in five coeds is sexually assaulted — according to a 2015 study by the Association of American Universities — can’t be ignored. Just because this is a campus-wide problem, doesn’t mean fraternities and sororities shouldn’t be part of the solution. In fact, it presents an important opportunity for Greek leaders to engage in the current discussion around legislation on Capitol Hill intended to create safer college campuses.

Every National President or Executive Director should have systems in place to avoid a myriad of issues, and should know what their response would be if high-profile misconduct were to occur. In addition to building good will, taking important steps to prevent a crisis can keep a local issue from escalating into something that threatens to erode the trust and goodwill of a fraternity’s and/or sorority’s many stakeholders.

Here are some steps for every Greek organization to take to prepare for a potential crisis.

Have a social media policy. Or at least a defined set of guidelines that each member is required to sign their name to. For many fraternities and sororities, social media falls under an overall conduct code but this is not enough. Social media needs its own set of rules. It should be in writing and should set standards and an approval process for the chapter’s channels. To be effective, the policy should promote a degree of self-policing among members’ own social channels. Some sororities, for instance, have a single code word that sisters post when they feel a photo or a status update is inappropriate. A designated social media point person would email women notifications that they should to remove offending images immediately.

Encourage local chapters to cultivate a regular dialogue with the designated Greek Life advisor and other key College & University administrators. It always helps if you have an established, trusted relationship before a crisis strikes with those that will be asking the tough questions during a difficult situation. These individuals can be advocates in time of need, can vouch for an organization’s character and provide insight as to what the Administration is thinking in terms of discipline or sanctions. Being familiar with these expectations early on can help Greek organizations understand how the community at large views the offense and can react in a way that doesn’t appear tone-deaf. Depending on the severity of the incident, a good working relationship and reputation on campus can also help keep these issues out of the press.

Ensure all financial transactions occur in a transparent manner. From members to officers to alumni volunteers, the headlines about Greek organizations having thousands to hundreds of thousands of dollars embezzled are sobering. To avoid such a scandal, make sure that a system of checks and balances is in place so one individual is not responsible for the checkbook.

Mandate that a program such as Billhighway is used on the local level across chapters and that every dollar is accounted for.

Have an internal investigation and adjudication process that works swiftly and fairly. When a crisis breaks, especially one where multiple audiences are paying attention, it’s critical to appear thoughtful, organized and decisive. Gather the facts, speak to all of those involved, consider the evidence and issue a ruling. Be as transparent as possible while protecting your members as much as you can. While it’s important to allow for due process, the appearance of Greek leaders dragging their feet when their organization’s reputation is on the line conveys the impression that they just don’t get it.

Make sure your chapter is performing (and promoting) good works. Volunteer time in a community project, raising money for a local charity? Make sure the chapter is talking, writing and gaining visibility around these good deeds. This is one way to build a reservoir of good will that can increase the likelihood that others will give you the benefit of the doubt when the going gets tough.

An embarrassing episode has negative implications not just for Greeks, but for the host institution as well. In fact, for colleges and universities, the stakes are even higher. In addition to student and reputation damage, schools have to concern themselves with lawsuits and how admissions and donations could be negatively impacted. That’s why when Greek organizations have solid crisis planning in place it benefits all parties.

Navigating the age of new populism

Have you complained about the cost of education, home prices or feeling like your salary is not going as far as it used to? If so, you might belong to a growing segment of new populists.

By Meg Alexander

In the healthcare industry, large pharmaceutical companies have traditionally researched, funded and developed new medicines under the supervision of federal safety requirements. As a result, many people are living longer lives and are cured of previously terminal diseases. Yet, we are witnessing acts of new populism in the form of patients, advocates, and physicians who are challenging the decisions made by medical developers. For example, national polls by the Kaiser Foundation indicate that 72% of Americans find the price of medicines to be “unreasonable;” most respondents blame the lack of affordability on the manufacturer. Similarly, earlier this year, leading physicians in oncology sounded a populist alarm when they published an editorial in a Mayo Clinic journal and initiated an e-petition on Change.org to raise concern about the affordability of cancer medicines relative to household incomes.

To navigate this new populist movement, health companies must quickly recognize that the direct engagement with patients is the “new norm.” Social media is allowing patients and advocacy groups to circumvent the doctors and voice their opinions online. As a result, it is now incumbent on pharmaceutical companies to communicate their intentions in terms that address these populist ideals, all while navigating a heavily-regulated environment. This often involves speaking in a humanizing language that differs from the language of investment to which CEOs are accustomed.

Context is also important in the era of new populism. Providing the facts, figures and rationale for why business decisions are made is unlikely to win popularity points, but it can help explain the hard decisions often made by company leaders. For example, many emerging pharmaceutical and biotech companies who seek to commercialize major medical advances are in debt in the early years of their work. We need to help the public understand that it is not greed, but a need to continue operating, save jobs and research life-saving medicines that influence how a medicine is priced.

Providing a vision is imperative. In an environment where big business is often looked on with cynicism, C-suite leaders and employees must have a vision that reflects the company’s values and demonstrates consistency. A good example was an announce-
Avoiding your next social media crisis

Looking back at some of the bigger PR gaffes from 2015 can serve as a good reminder for what crisis professionals can look for in the coming year.

Pushing boundaries and bringing brands directly to the consumer has long been the motivation for brands’ social media engagement. However, when something goes wrong in this public forum, or a crisis unfolds online, the risk is often not worth the reward. So, how could brands that stumbled in 2015 have done better? And what can we learn from these gaffes to prepare us for next year?

AskJPM

Where they went wrong: JP Morgan, like many brands, had good intentions when it launched its AskJPM Twitter series, a live Twitter Q&A with senior executives. However, before going live, the brand should have listened better to the industry and conversation happening online, realizing that the time was not right to put a banking executive out there for an open Q&A. And while the brand pulled the concept immediately, the damage was done.

What they could have done? Clearly the social sphere has concerns about the industry and banking practices. AskJPM could have focused on one of these issues and addressed it via a blog or Periscope. This way, it was focusing the conversation on an issue, not just an open forum for customer complaints.

Lesson learned? Listen better, and listen always. Listening first may have saved the brand from a hijacked account and posts like: “Can I have my house back? #AskJPM”

Volkswagen Emissions Scandal

Where they went wrong: Earlier this year, the EPA issued a notice of violation to Volkswagen regarding an emissions scandal; almost immediately, the brand set itself up for a social media witch-hunt by going silent and hiding from the issue. For about a week, the normally vocal brand hunkered down and allowed fans the time to ruminate and get angry.

What they could have done? Volkswagen knew the EPA news was coming, so it could have timed its communication with the news. Even if Volkswagen could not say much, saying nothing allowed their passionate consumers to create their own story.

Lesson learned? You can’t run or hide.

Deflategate

Where they went wrong: Deflategate blew up well beyond what the NFL and Patriots probably ever imagined. Both parties — including Tom Brady — remained quiet and waited for the final report to become public. Neither used their powerful reach on social media to tell their side of the story; they allowed the accusations to lead the news.

What they could have done? There was a period of weeks where each party could have showed how they were putting practices in place to ensure this would never be an issue again. Proactive communications and more transparency could have kept some of the negativity at bay. Instead the fans and the report led the conversation, and put Brady and others at third and long with little option but to punt.

Lesson learned? Leverage social dialogue to get ahead of the news, and tell your story.

Coke & Global Energy Balance Network

Where they went wrong: The Coke brand — including Tom Brady — remained quiet and waited for the final report to become public. Instead the fans and the report led the conversation, and put Brady and others at third and long with little option but to punt.

Lesson learned? Leverage social dialogue to get ahead of the news, and tell your story.

Cision buys PR Newswire

Cision has inked a deal to acquire PR Newswire for $841 million from UBM, after months of speculation as the London-based publisher and trade events producer sought a buyer of the profitable news disseminator.

The price tag includes $810 million in cash and $31 million in equity. Cision is owned by the private equity firm GTCR, which has cobbled together Cision, Vocus and Gorkana Group to create a PR services powerhouse.

UBM was expected to garner more than $700 million for PRN and Cision was among reported suitors of the unit.

With the deal, Cision adds a legacy news dissemination service to its tech-based offerings, which include the low-cost PRweb, as well as Gorkana’s and Cision’s own PR platforms. Parent GTCR bought Vocus in 2014 in a $446.5 million deal.

The sale will have to clear US regulators and UBM shareholders but is expected to close in the first quarter of Q1. A special dividend of around $371 million will go to existing shareholders.

Lesson learned? Make sure your product and pitch stands up to your platform.

Subway and Jared

Where they went wrong: Subway could have managed a few issues better when news of the FBI investigation into spokesperson Jared Fogle broke. First, there appeared to be no game plan for the company, despite rumors about Jared, which surfaced more than eight years ago. Second, and most damaging, Subway’s responses on social channels as the FBI investigation played out was not consistent and offered very little to its consumers, franchisees or employees.

What they could have done? Plan better, for starters. But aside from that, Subway needed to be more consistent and decisive in its outbound messaging. Social posts were confusing and ended with “no further comment.” The brand should have communicated its sympathy for the victims and families, and needed to stand behind its decision to part ways.

Lesson learned? Have a game plan, and never say never.

C ybersecurity is a pressing and poorly understood issue across all sectors. With big names such as Target, JP Morgan Chase, Sony Pictures Entertainment, and health insurance giant Anthem in the digital crosshairs, CEOs and boards are zeroing in on cybersecurity threats as a growing risk to their businesses.

While security is the central concern, it is increasingly important that companies get ahead of the communications curve to develop and defend not just data, but their own narrative. A company’s data story should explain to both the public and employees how the company is benefiting from the collection and analysis of data — a critical issue for many investors — and how they are acting responsibly to protect it.

Unfortunately, misunderstandings about data security and hacking are hampering efforts to develop and communicate effective strategies. With anxiety high as a result of headlines and public outcry around high-profile breaches, these false impressions are keeping corporations on the defensive. Here are some myths that have emerged around corporate data security — and why they’re wrong.

MYTH: Your computer network is safe if you have a strong enough security “fence.”

FACT: There is a “new normal.” Every fence has holes. Hackers will find a way into your system, so you need to plan for that eventuality by enhancing the internal protection of your most critical data. You should also think ahead about how you will explain a hacking episode publicly. What story do you want to be able to tell when — not if — your company has a breach?

MYTH: All security incidents are created equal.

FACT: Hackers have different methods and objectives when accessing corporate systems. Like robbers rattling doorknobs to find an unlocked house, hackers test security systems all the time. Some merely probe networks, while others seek to steal, manipulate or destroy data. The information they target varies with the intent, from customer credit card data that they can steal to sensitive internal communications, research and development projects, or full customer profiles that can be used to expose or embarrass the parties involved.

MYTH: The government will help with a breach.

FACT: You’re mostly on your own. In many countries, companies learn they had a security incident from a government agency, but often the assistance ends there. For major events where officials are interested in information about how a hack was executed, the government might offer investigative or forensic help from law enforcement and intelligence officials. But governments are sometimes wary — for legal or political reasons — of helping companies fix their computer systems or of retaliating against the believed perpetrator of a hack on behalf of a company or group of companies. Governments have their hands full protecting their own networks.

MYTH: Breach investigations will quickly tell you what happened.

FACT: Companies usually discover breaches long after they occur, and forensic investigations often take weeks or months to produce data. Even when complete, those investigations sometimes can’t pinpoint who was responsible for the hack. It’s important to manage expectations within a company during an investigation about how much information will likely be gleaned about the hack.

MYTH: Computer systems security is just an information technology problem.

FACT: People, not software, tend to be the weakest link in data protection. A study by computer security firm Trend Micro found that 91% of cyberinfiltrations began with “phishing,” where malicious links are embedded in emails sent to unsuspecting employees or customers. Recipients unknowingly grant the hacker access to their computers when they click on the link.

MYTH: Communicating about a corporate breach must be reactive.

FACT: Plotting out a communications strategy in advance for different types of data security problems will help a company understand the risks and plan for them. It’s also worth thinking about what data the company has that could be damaging to it — or others — if released.

MYTH: All hacking is a cyberattack.

FACT: There are many flavors of hacking, and the most common types are not attacks but network infiltrations to steal corporate secrets. Cyberattacks that manipulate or destroy data or computer systems are still relatively rare. However, these attacks have been on the rise, as seen recently with the breach at Sony Pictures that both destroyed data and exposed embarrassing company communications.

MYTH: Governments will help with a breach.

FACT: Given the reputational risk a breach generates, an organization’s communications team should be involved in early discussions about the event to provide guidance on how to ensure the company maintains the trust of the public. The team should also be well-versed in cybersecurity basics before a hacking incident, so it can quickly get up to speed when one occurs.

MYTH: With a breach, the biggest problems are security and legal issues.

FACT: The greatest threat a breach poses is ultimately to corporate reputation. While the need to fix security problems and address legal issues is clear, companies may not realize that how they discuss the event publicly at the outset will often determine whether they can recover the confidence of the public — and investors — once it is over. Companies that change their story over time risk a more severe loss of that trust.

You could probably use a best friend.

At Peppercomm, decades of experience guiding countless clients through a wide variety of crises has made us acutely aware of where all the issues lie. We’re listening, carefully, thoroughly, thoughtfully. Just like any good friend.

Our proprietary methodology helps to effectively manage the crisis in today’s hyper connected, 24/7 world.

Then we provide thorough crisis preparedness training, so that you’re diligently prepared for any potential, future crisis.

Whenever you could use a friendly ear, whatever your communication needs, Peppercomm is here to partner with you. We’re here pushing boundaries while we’re mitigating risk. That’s what best friends are for.

Failure to plan guarantees a “crisis within a crisis”

We would all serve ourselves well to evolve our thinking to account for the unexpected advent of a crisis. If we embrace a culture of preparation through anticipation, each of us can be better prepared for the likelihood that crises will occur. Still, for now, few are properly prepared to handle these dire situations.

Whether it’s a corporation, government entity, non-profit or individual, preparing for crisis includes having a plan that involves candor, control, cooperation and cool. Rather than let a crisis be defined in the terms and on the turf of others — including media — take charge of telling your own story, painful as that seems, or risk being on the permanent defensive.

These oversimplified tips are relevant to developing and activating any crisis plan — and it all begins with having a plan.

Be prepared. Have a plan. Before a crisis happens, you need to have a plan to deal with any potential crisis. Crises generally come in the form of fiscal or physical.

Fiscal: someone stole something; something cost too much; numbers don’t add up and taxpayers or stockholders are undermined.

Physical: through some action, inaction or neglect, something is terribly damaged, someone is hurt or made ill — and, at worst, someone is killed.

Identify your crisis team and spokesperson, and train personnel how to handle the crisis — quickly. Lack of preparation makes a crisis much worse and more difficult to deal with. No one is immune to a crisis, so you need to be prepared — it’s not if, but when.

Get the facts, fast. Tell the truth; never lie. You need to create an information funnel to control the message. Always tell the truth; never lie. Examples of what NOT to do: politicians like Anthony Weiner and athletes like Lance Armstrong. Be fearless in getting out information. This is not a place for spin — but for facts and updated information, regularly.

Break your own bad news. Define the crisis in your terms on your own turf. You must get in front of the story and drive the information yourself. You need to publicly say: here is what we know and what we have done about it. If a mistake has been made, shine a light on it.

No comment = guilt. It’s important to understand the difference between court of law (presumption of innocence) and court of public opinion (presumption of guilt). Remember to have confidence in your own competence; don’t fail for “circle the wagons’ mentality.

Attorneys may counsel to say little or nothing, but that is a path fraught with peril in the court of public opinion. Remember: honesty, candor, transparency, time-limited updates, admission of fault, separating guilty parties/wrongdoers from the “good guy” organization, commitment to corrective action all are integral elements of any crisis.

Communicate with all audiences. Make sure you communicate with internal audiences, such as employees, shareholders, suppliers and vendors, as well as external audiences, such as customers, public officials, the media and the general public.

The media operates as an amplifier to most other audiences, too, in addition to being an important audience on their own.

Feed the media early, regularly, truthfully. Make sure you provide regular statements that reflect genuine sensitivity and concern. Update details, facts.

Don’t be afraid to challenge the media when they get it wrong or are unfair. If necessary, you should climb higher on the newsroom hierarchy if a reporter fails or declines to correct a bad mistake. Even if the error isn’t corrected now, you could lay the foundation for a follow-up story.

Take real action steps. Cooperate with authorities. Implement new protocols. It is important that you communicate steps you’ve taken — for all audiences — to be able to assure this (whatever is at the heart of the crisis) “never happens again.”

Bring in third-party validators. You should work with outside experts who can evaluate the situation, provide expert advice to best correct any missteps, and implement new protocols and procedures.

Make sure you show audiences that you take the crisis seriously. Outside experts can validate the corrective action is appropriate and positive.

Open a proactive positive track even as you deal with the crisis. Look for positive news hooks that show movement forward from the crisis. Develop a way to protect your brand’s reputation and focus on the positive rather than the negative.

Honesty, candor, transparency, timely updates, admission of fault, separating guilty parties/wrongdoers from the “good guy” organization, commitment to corrective action all are integral elements of any crisis.

No one wants a crisis, but they happen every day. Knowing that reality removes the excuse of unpreparedness for any organization — public, private or non-profit.

Deal with it: early, openly and with courage, candor and, when appropriate, contrition.

Benjamin Franklin’s crisis wisdom still applies today

Benjamin Franklin’s adages and aphorisms remain relevant in our complex media landscape today, and can be used as a guideline for reputation management and crisis communications.

By Michael Fineman

As hashtag hijacking, social live-streaming, email hacks and cyber attacks, superbugs and flash activists: today’s brands face myriad fissures that can burst into full-blown geysers at the speed of a tweet, propelling them into uncharted territory.

As circumstances that feed and amplify the need for crisis communications evolve and multiply, public relations professionals are challenged to keep pace and adapt. Social media listening, rapid and in-kind responses and message development must be deployed as never before. The ever-changing media landscape demands a reconfiguration of strategies and tactics lest practitioners find themselves prey to another year’s “biggest PR blunders.”

While brands face unprecedented risks and PR pros new trials, certain foundational principles have stood the test of time.

To wit, the wisdom of Benjamin Franklin, born 310 years ago this month. Franklin was a superhero back when our republic was born. I’ve sensed that his profile is diminished of late, but his accomplishments as an author, scientist, statesman, inventor, communicator and diplomat could be compared in breadth and depth to the likes of Da Vinci, Galileo and Newton. So, in honor of his January 17 birthday, let us recognize Benjamin Franklin, one of our Founding Fathers, for instilling in society bedrock principles that all PR practitioners would be wise to remember.

Franklin’s proverbs are embedded in our nation’s lexicon, and some of the best known could have been written with crisis communications in mind: “Glass, china and reputation are easily crack’d, and never well mended”; “An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure”; “No gains without pains”; “Haste makes waste”; “A friend in need is a friend indeed”; “A penny saved is a penny earned.”

More to the point, Franklin published a number of adages that serve as the basis for reputation management and crisis communications.

“By failing to prepare, you are preparing to fail.” Every crisis is unique, but strategic preparation will help you take a principled approach rather than flying by the seat of the pants. Communications planning and media training give you the tools needed to create helpful media opportunities, establish a media policy covering digital and social media as well as traditional news media, create visuals, develop or enhance a media monitoring program, secure third-party support, and craft and rehearse responses to important questions.

“IT takes many good deeds to build a good reputation, and only one bad one to lose it.” A trustworthy reputation is your most precious asset. In the event of a crisis, a strong reputation will serve as a bulwark of credibility that will allow you to capture the benefit of the doubt and recover speedily. However, if you fail to respond appropriately, regardless of your reputation, a crisis can destroy your brand. In less dire forms, a crisis could still badly damage your organization and, at the very least, cause misunderstanding and lost revenues and customers.

“NEver ruin an apology with an excuse.” In a crisis situation, your audiences expect you to demonstrate care and concern for those affected — not to deflect blame, blameworthy and further insult. If an apology is appropriate, make it clean, succinct, unequivocal and heartfelt. And don’t make it an afterthought; apologize up front.

“HE that speaks much is much mistaken.” When responding to a crisis, it is important not to run on, especially when speaking with media. Wandy responses can lead you to speculate, provide unconfirmed facts or new content for the media to target, sound too promotional or bureaucratic, speak on behalf of others, or divert attention from your core messages. Know what you need to say, say it and stop. Once you’ve said too much, you can’t take it back.

“Humility makes great men twice honorable.” In a crisis, your credibility and reputation may be questioned. Trumpeting your successes and achievements is not as powerful as when others sing your praises. If you’re actively building your reputation, you’ll gain relationships with key influencers, who can add credibility to your message and help balance your response. Hold on to your dignity.

“If you will not hear and obey reason she will surely rap your knuckles.” When a crisis strikes, you’ll be in the “hot zone,” between internal pressure to staunch the bleeding and external pressure to respond. These pressures can lead you to overreact precipitously or, worse, freeze. Listen carefully to outside counsel. They are not as emotionally invested as you probably are and more apt to see the forest for the trees.

“There is no little enemy.” Arrogance and dismissiveness can only hurt you. If you don’t take every crisis situation seriously and consider all potential audiences, you risk further damage and negative momentum, which will be more costly and time-consuming to recover from in the end — if ever. Get to know all your stakeholders, and consider what is concerning to each of them. The best managed crises are those which do not see the light of day. Update your crisis scenario plans regularly, especially with consideration to adversaries and potential adversaries.

“Silence is not always a sign of wisdom, but babbling is ever a folly.” Others recognize that still waters run deep. While it is important to make sure your voice is heard in a crisis, both your tone and the way you present are as important as your message and will, in fact, serve to demonstrate your message for good or bad. Rehearse your key messages so they are sincere and succinct. When the time comes to speak, confirm all facts and dispel all lies. Tell the truth as simply as possible. Media training helps you designate appropriate spokespeople, state your point with evidence, conclude with your point intact, then stop talking.

You never know when a crisis will strike or what form it might take, but it is critical for you to prepare for the unexpected and respond quickly and strategically. As innovative technologies and the media landscape continue to evolve, Ben Franklin’s words from more than 300 years ago remain relevant. Take heed or succumb to the maelstrom.

Report details massive government PR spending

The U.S. government is the “second largest public relations firm in the world,” and has spent more than $4 billion on PR work since 2007, according to a watchdog report.

The federal government has dropped more than $4 billion on PR work since 2007, according to a report conducted by non-profit Open the Books, a nonpartisan watchdog dedicated to transparency in public spending.

Those findings were reported today by political site The Hill. The Open the Books report, titled “The Department of Self-Promotion: How Federal Agency PR Spending Advances Their Interests Rather Than the Public Interest,” shows the federal government spent $4.35 billion in combined public affairs salaries, bonuses and outside PR contract work between 2007 and 2015.

These figures account for more than $2.3 billion in salaries, as well as “performance bonuses” totaling nearly $11 million given to federal public affairs officers in the last eight years. In 2014 alone, more than 3,000 federal public affairs officers were employed by more than 200 federal agencies, and more than half — 1,858 public affairs officers — took a base salary of at least $100,000. Given the number of public affairs officers on its payroll, the report claims the U.S. government is now the “second largest public relations firm in the world.”

Despite boasting such a massive in-house PR staff, however, about half the money the federal government spent on PR in the last eight years has gone to outside PR firms. More than $2 billion has been spent by 139 government agencies on contracts with outside PR firms since 2007, according to the report, accounting for 2,403 PR vendors and 16,249 transactions.

The biggest federal spenders on outside PR contracts include The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the U.S. Army, the EPA, FEMA, the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, the Navy and the National Institutes of Health, among others. According to the report, the ten biggest federal agency spenders dropped more than $50 million in outside PR consulting in the last eight years, which represents almost 70% of all outside PR spends made during that period.

The most common services paid to outside PR consulting firms are “market research and public opinion” and “public relations services.” The Open the Books report shows more than half of those private PR spends went to some of the country’s largest PR agencies: Laughlin, Marinaccio & Owens, Inc., $87.98 million; Young & Rubicam Inc., $57.5 million; Ogilvy PR Worldwide, $47.93 million; Fleishman-Hillard, Inc., $42.4 million; and Gallup, $42.0 million.

Reviewing U.S. General Services Administration labor supply contracts, the Open the Books report discovered in the fees several bloated employee salaries. Booz Allen Hamilton billed the government at a rate of $525.62 per hour for an “executive manager” (equal to weekly pay of $21,025, or an annual salary of $1,093,290). Ketchum billed up to $88.26 per hour (or a salary of $183,581 per year) for a position titled “intern.”

The report claims outside PR costs have skyrocketed under the Obama administration, revealing a 47% difference between the highest two years for PR costs during Obama’s tenure, compared to spending during the last two years of the Bush administration. Government PR positions have grown 15% in the last seven years — or about more than 400 employees — from 2,688 to its current roster of 3,092 employees. PR salary spending has increased by more than 22% per year, according to the report.

In October, Republicans in the Senate Budget Committee launched a probe into the federal government’s spending on outside PR work. The Senate Finance Committee has since requested that the Obama administration divulge information related to PR and ad spending related to the Affordable Care Act.

Open the Books claims its report is intended to examine “cases when federal agencies go beyond making information available and engage in self-promotion.”

Many companies or institutions will confront unforeseen events that could alter their future, pose unprecedented challenges and potentially set them on a new course that will redefine the organization and significantly impact key stakeholders.

What is required in these circumstances is an expert, experienced strategic communications partner to work with senior management and a Board of Directors to:

- Articulate a new business strategy and a vision for success
- Explain an enterprise-transforming event and its significance
- Successfully navigate complex business challenges or crises
- Build trust and support among key stakeholders
- Strengthen the organization’s credibility, reputation, and brand

Successful execution requires superior counsel, judgment and expertise, broad experience, and a comprehensive, effective and intelligent approach for communicating to all stakeholders.

For over 45 years companies and institutions around the world have selected and relied on Kekst to provide that counsel and support.

Crisis management: 70% internal, 30% external

Having internal protocols in place that effectively handle the flow of information and address the issues at hand are key to success in crisis management.

My first mock crisis exercise was held at a chemical plant. The number-one complaint expressed during our critique was lack of communication among team members. The litany of frustrations included radios that didn’t work, security that wasn’t trained to shield family members from reporters and an upset plant manager who had missed critical information that could have been shared with journalists.

At the time, Ichalked up our shortcomings to a team that still had a lot of work to do, but after 25 years in crisis communications, I can appreciate the importance of that early experience. Today when I talk with executives about crisis management, their focus is almost exclusively external. They are worried about how reporters will cover the story or what they might say to upset customers.

The reality is, if leaders spent more time focused on the internal aspects of crisis management, their ability to respond externally would improve dramatically.

In crisis management, the name of the game is speed. The faster a crisis team can get ahead of the issue, the less damage will be caused to the company. Speed is based on three factors: the flow of information inside the company, the internal processes that drive decisions, and trust.

A supply of information
Lack of information is the number one reason companies choose not to respond rapidly. It’s true that sometimes critical information is not available, but far too often it’s discovered after the fact that a key piece of information was blocked by a senior manager afraid to share bad news. How many times has a spokesperson learned of a disaster from the media and not their own company? Information plays a critical role in determining the strategic direction leaders choose to address an issue. If the flow is slow, too soon will be the response.

Having a process in place
One way to improve the flow of communication is to fine-tune internal processes that drive decision-making. During table top exercises, you can measure how team dynamics impact a company’s ability to respond.

During a recent training exercise with a client, I challenged the team with a scenario they already knew was coming. Yet it still took them an hour to get to work due to a handful of players who clearly didn’t know their role in the crisis plan. Dysfunction within a team is a direct result of a lack of process and understanding of how that process works. Without that understanding, meetings become a free-for-all with differing opinions and paralyzing indecision.

Team structure, clear roles and responsibilities, and simple protocols are all effective tools to manage the chaos.

As a former journalist, I like to use the newsroom as the perfect example. During a major, breaking story newsrooms are filled with screaming producers, and scrambling reporters and editors. The untrained eye might think of this as complete chaos, but in reality it’s organized frenzy where everyone knows their job, which enables them to make the on-air show look like a polished presentation of the facts. If internal teams aren’t clear on their roles and responsibilities — and if they can’t immediately get to work to address the issues without direction — the company’s ability to respond effectively will suffer.

Poll: Clinton is most dishonest candidate

A December Economist/YouGov poll shows that former Secretary of State and 2016 Presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, when compared among the leading seven Democratic and Republican candidates for presidency, ranks lowest among the public overall in terms of perceived honesty and trustworthiness.

More than half of those polled — 53% — described the leading Democratic candidate as “not honest and trustworthy.” An overwhelming 85% of Republican respondents described her as dishonest, and 56% of Independents said the same, while 24% of Democrats agreed with this statement.

The only leading candidate who comes close to rivaling Clinton’s deficit of trust among Americans is Donald Trump, who was characterized as dishonest by 51% of respondents. Trump, similarly, was described as “honest” by only 33% of those polled, only two points above Clinton.

The poll did reveal a few silver linings for Clinton: more than half — 59% — of Democrats polled considered Clinton honest, and most Americans overall claimed they prefer Clinton over Senator Bernie Sanders as the Democratic nominee.

“Clinton’s low trust numbers clearly pose a challenge for her campaign,” Will Jordan, YouGov America elections editor, told O’Dwyer’s. “However, she continues to be rated highly in other areas, like strength and leadership ability, which may be offsetting some of the effect.”

Crisis management: 70% internal, 30% external
Response versus reputation enhancement

When communications pros speak about managing a crisis, the discussion now often centers on speed: react quickly, get ahead of the story, quell rumors and disseminate your message without delay. While speed is always important, a thoughtful and successful crisis communications approach also requires keeping the longer-term implications of an organization’s reputation in proper focus.

By Alex Stanton

A timely communications response to a crisis has always been important, but a 24/7 news cycle — coupled with the explosion of mobile, online and social media — has contributed to a “need for speed” crisis culture. As a result, emerging from a crisis with your reputation intact is more akin to a marathon than a sprint.

A crisis, however, should be seen as more than an event that demands fast action in the moment. It should be the catalyst for the development — or refinement — and execution of a reputation communications effort that will play out for weeks and months, long after the inciting event has been resolved. Though it may be tempting to let out a sigh of relief after calm has been restored, it is your post-crisis actions that will act responsibly.

The natural impetus for all involved may be to put the crisis in the rear view mirror and get back to some form of normalcy. The communications team must walk the fine line between showing the proper degree of attention without dwelling on the negative. Communicate too little and the organization might be viewed as arrogant. Communicate too much and the organization may be seen as paralyzed, wounded and backward-looking. Following are some things to consider when developing a reputation management response that strikes the right balance:

Acknowledging the problem. In this age of transparency, it’s important to acknowledge the problem and make a definitive statement that you are committed to do better. This shouldn’t be confused with accepting all of the blame. Rather, it underscores that the organization has not willfully ignored the underlying issues, and is addressing their issues thoughtfully and for the long-term. Organizations should use this opportunity to explain what processes and procedures were in place to prevent or mitigate the event, identify the apparent gaps, and give tangible direction around next steps.

Progress updates. Thoughtful people understand that the issues underlying a crisis are not solved with the wave of a magic wand. Once an organization has committed to making improvements, it is critical to make this a priority and share progress. Many organizations fall short in one or both areas, perhaps hoping their constituents will forget, or feeling that their word is good enough. A reputation-minded company will be proactive in communicating what is being done and why. You don’t have to provide every last detail, but a brief rundown on meaningful changes goes a long way toward instilling faith that your organization has taken the lessons to heart and will act responsibly.

Engagement with the affected. While a reputation management program must work broadly, special attention must be paid to those who were directly affected by a crisis situation. This might mean the community around a plant where there was a safety issue, or business customers who received a faulty product. In any of these cases, the organization must do what it can to make the communication personal. For suppliers, business partners and wholesale customers, this is usually fairly straightforward because there is a structure already in place where each relationship has an “owner.” Still, having the communication come from a more senior person — along with the relationship owner — is a wise step to convey that this is an ongoing priority for the organization.

Employees are your most important ambassadors and front line of defense in a crisis, but may also be the most cynical. Direct communication with employees is a good gesture, but executives should strongly consider going the extra mile by meeting select employees one-on-one or in small groups, sharing the feedback with senior executives, and acting on that input.

Consider a formal initiative. Some situations may call for a more formal commitment — and communication of an initiative — to demonstrate that attention is being paid. For example, a branded employee education initiative (e.g. “Safety, Security, and Success: 2016”) following a plant accident, with clearly defined, measurable objectives, and quarterly reporting to key executives.

Another good example would be a philanthropic effort that broadly relates to the reputational challenges, showing that the company is engaged and working to support solutions.

Many organizations proclaim they are “taking this very seriously” in the wake of a crisis. Those who take a longer view and focus on the right communications issues over time will be the most successful in repairing the damage done, preventing future occurrences, making progress with internal culture, and building a strong reputation.

Why “crisis marketing” is a misnomer

When a crisis hits, it isn’t always necessary to call in the rescue squad. In many cases, a thorough, strategic communications plan can double as a crisis communications blueprint.

By Cortney Stapleton

The Federal Trade Commission on December 22 issued a stern warning to publishers and marketers, with a new series of guidelines for native advertising, or online content supplied by marketers that appears in newsfeeds and often takes on the appearance of journalism.

With its enforcement policy updates, the Commission offers a series of general principles for properly disclosing advertisements to consumers, and lays out what constitutes a “deceptive ad” in violation of the FTC Act.

Disclosure is the order of the day: The policy statement claims marketing content that has been formatted to look like news content must be clearly labeled as advertising. The Commission defines ads as “deceptive” if they mislead consumers about their commercial nature, or are not clear as to their source.

Ad disclosures must be made in “simple, unequivocal language,” according to the enforcement policy, and must also “be made in the same language as the predominant language in which ads are communicated.”

Not all native ads are required to carry these disclosures, however, if they appear “so clearly commercial in nature that they are unlikely to mislead consumers.”

According to Doug Simon, CEO and president of D S Simon Media, the new guidelines provide needed clarity for disclosure that can be beneficial to brands and marketing firms. There may be cases where marketers have created content that’s accurate, but the FTC may still have a problem with it if it’s presented in a misleading way.

“Advertisers can still be in violation of the new guidelines even if you place the words ‘sponsored content’ prominently in the native ad, which is surprising. The FTC claims consumers may not understand that the advertiser influenced the content. A safer disclosure would be ‘Content from (advertiser)’ if you want to be in compliance,” Simon told ODwyer’s. “While ad agencies and operators of advertising networks may be targeted by the FTC, it’s the advertisers themselves that are at the greatest risk. It’s imperative that they partner with firms that demonstrate an in-depth understanding of these issues as well as FTC spokesperson guidelines to minimize risk.”

Simon also cited a potential loophole that exists for marketers in the Commission’s notion that not all native ads must disclose their commercial nature.

I once had the unfortunate experience of kicking off a client engagement during crisis mode. The ink was still fresh on the contract as we huddled into a 72-hour crisis communications session. The experience produced an unintended benefit, however, in the sense that it gave my team incredible insight into the company’s leadership, culture and communication behaviors that became a key part of the long-term communications strategy we developed.

In the process, I realized that crisis communications isn’t dramatically different than regular communications. The timeline is simply intensified.

There’s no need for the latest crisis management guide or putting a crisis firm on speed dial, so long as you take the time each year to develop a thoughtful strategic communications plan and review social media guidelines. While there may be some extreme crisis situations that warrant more heavyweights, most of the time, these two resources will serve as a solid guide to organizations facing a crisis.

Instead of focusing on how to respond in moments of crisis, I’m highlighting the four elements that ought to be in your current communications strategy that can double as your crisis response resource:

Delivering the right message to the right people. A good communications plan is informed by understanding where your key audiences live, which includes the various online channels where they communicate. A crisis typically requires very targeted communications to affected targeted audiences. Regardless of what you say to the market — in times of both crisis and normalcy — the rules are the same: figure out your message for each audience and deliver it via the appropriate channels.

Accessibility. If your audience can’t reach you, you’re dead in the water. Social channels like Facebook and Twitter are your 1-800 numbers that must be monitored constantly. If a crisis erupts on social media, consider the potential ripple effect and whether a response is warranted on other channels. Apply the same strategy for disseminating thought leadership content to your audiences, but in reverse. Key to successfully navigating these situations is a good social media policy that aligns with your organization’s culture and, most importantly, that employees embrace in good times and bad. It doesn’t have to be a 13-page narrative like The Smithsonian’s; it could be as simple as Zappos’ policy, which is “be smart.”

Operating with honesty and integrity. Transparency should be emphasized throughout a strategic communications plan and is critical to engaging with audiences, especially in difficult times. Inevitably all companies make mistakes and will need to utter the words “I’m sorry.” The more complex, delayed and detached the answer, the worse it makes the situation. This HBR article offers a smart, simple formula for corporate apologies, citing numerous well-intentioned, sophisticated organizations who completely botched them. Every communication, from apologies to white papers, underscores the core values and integrity of your company. Don’t be tone deaf.

Listening and reacting. The easiest way not to be tone deaf in your communications is to listen. Listening is a core part of any marketing strategy—as a way to learn what your audience cares about, how they are responding to what you publish and how they feel about your company’s products or services. When a crisis hits, it simply elevates attention levels. If you’ve been doing the right things all along, you’ll likely face an audience that is more receptive to listening back.

If you find yourself facing a crisis without an active integrated marketing communications plan, Jay Baer has a great roadmap from his book The Now Revolution you can bookmark. Or maybe you need a crisis firm on speed dial. However, spending the time and resources upfront to develop a thorough communications plan can serve multiple benefits, save you valuable time and money in times of crisis, and might help you sleep better at night.

Know how to run a biz, PR firms tell jobseekers

Executives of major PR firms spent nearly two hours on December 8 telling members of the New York chapter of PR Society of America what they look for in new employees.

Our main takeaway was that agency people not only have to be good writers, ambitious, articulate and creative, but also business people. They must know “how to run a business,” they must show what client goals were achieved at other agencies, or how they successfully ran their own businesses, the 65 attendees were told. Moderator was Art Stevens of The Stevens Group.

PR people now often report to the chief marketing officer at clients, noted Richard Edelman, whose firm billed $797 million and employed 5,308 as of Dec. 31, 2014. It is 6.7 times as big as the nearest independent.

“If you can’t read a profit and loss statement or are economically illiterate, go back to school and take economics,” advised Edelman. “Learn how to run a business.”

Know what specialties are “hot”

Peter Finn, founding partner of Finn Partners, which has grown in four years from 150 staffers to 500 in 12 offices handling $70 million in fees, described nine practice areas headed by tech and healthcare.

He advised jobseekers to check the nearly 500 specialty rankings that are compiled by the O’Dwyer Co. to see what specialties are generating the most fees. He described the culture of the firm as “Work hard, play nice.” About $1 million in firm time is devoted to public service projects.

The O’Dwyer tech/industrial category ranked 73 firms headed by Edelman with $265 million in fees in 2014. Finn Partners was No. 9 on the tech list with $12.7M in fees.

Eighteen of the top 25 firms had double-digit gains, reflecting the move of what is generally regarded as “PR” to the agency side of the industry.

Corporate PR departments have shrunk in recent years. At major companies, IR, marketing and legal have become dominant. The dominant corporate PR organization, now known as “Seminar” but called “PR Seminar” until 2008, holds its meetings off-the-record and membership lists are confidential. No press coverage has ever been allowed even by editors attending or speaking at the annual four-day meetings at the finest resorts in the U.S. Fewer editors have attended in recent years possibly because they don’t want to take part in such off-the-record proceedings.

The last New York Times staffer to address the group was John Geddes, financial editor, who spoke to it in 1996. Catherine Mathis, NYT PR head from 1997-2009 and now with McGraw-Hill Education, was listed as an attendee for four years but she said she never went to any of the meetings. NYT has never mentioned the existence of Seminar.

Another takeaway we got was that new employees will almost certainly come from an agency background. That has been industry wisdom for as long as we can remember. Working for a single company or institution builds a different mindset from that which is required in agency life. “You can go from an agency to a company but not vice versa,” say PR pros.

“Work hard, play hard”

Ed Moed, co-CEO of Peppercomm, said the firm, which grew to $20M in 2015 from $16M in 2014, has a culture of “work hard, play hard.” Peppercomm “is entrepreneurial to the core,” he said. “Everyone in the firm is creative.”

It likes staffers “who take risks” even though mistakes may be made and who “create value for clients.” Successful job candidates will “show how smart they are” and how they may have managed a business. “We will ask you a lot of questions,” he said.

A sophisticated candidate will “turn the tables on me and ask me questions,” he said. Media relations skills are important but employees must also know how to manage a client relationship. Employees must become an integral part of the agency culture.

Peppercomm’s training program includes having staffers do a stand-up comedy routine since this helps them to build story-telling skills.

Foreign service is route to Edelman

Edelman says successful job candidates who are most likely to agree to working abroad will be young and single. The firm has offices in more than 20 countries and is especially looking for recruiters who have knowledge of French, Spanish or Mandarin Chinese.

“We are looking for people who have the flexibility to get up and go” to countries including those in Asia and the Middle East, he said. They must then have the ability to re-integrate themselves with U.S. staffers when they return from such a posting.

Edelman said the firm is “far too Anglo” and it is doing what it can to recruit candidates of color or who are Hispanic or Asian.

He touched on a problem that exists not only on the agency side but on the corporate side.

Paul urges minority recruitment

Counselor Michael Paul, a longtime member of Seminar, this year skipped the May 31-June 3 meeting in Colorado Springs to protest lack of people of color in high posts.

There is only a “sprinkling” of minorities in the group which has nearly 300 members, he said. Paul is one of 13 executives on the website who are shown praising the group. One other person of color is also shown, Barry Caldwell of Waste Management.

Seminar, said Paul, “is like Davos for CCOs and PR executives. It is the most selective group of corporate communications and PR executives in our industry.”

Companies, PR firms, PR groups and executive recruiters have failed in recent years to recruit minorities for top positions, he said. The main thrust, according to Paul, is recruiting for entry-level jobs. He called for more action from groups such as the PR Council and the Arthur W. Page Society.

“F or years we have heard cries of, ‘We can’t find any qualified senior executive candidates of color and that we must focus on entry level positions.’ It must stop now,” he said.

AMG is a strategic communications firm with more than 30 years of experience advising U.S. and international organizations through times of change. We distinguish ourselves from our peers by focusing on partnering closely with our clients to understand an organization’s business, culture and goals to achieve results. We offer a breadth of services to achieve success in all assignments. Our professionals operate in six disciplines: corporate financial relations, investor relations and shareholder activism, transaction communications, crisis management, initial public offerings, and corporate restructuring and bankruptcy. AMG is a founding member of the AMO network, a partnership of leading strategic communication consultants in the financial centers of Europe, Asia and North and South America.

Our crisis management approach is practical and sometimes unconventional. It has produced tangible and lasting results for clients and crisis victims. Crises are unexpected. They can do great harm, but they can be managed. Our crisis management experts assist clients when unplanned circumstances threaten the public perception and financial standing of their businesses. We offer support to clients in all phases of crisis planning and response by advocating a crisis preparedness discipline that involves identifying areas of vulnerability, establishing procedures, training spokespeople and agreeing to broad principles of crisis conduct.

Fineman PR’s high-profile crisis communications work has achieved national renown. In today’s fast-paced culture of instant media exposure, online defamations and quick-draw lawsuits, its battle-tested experience and strategic resourcefulness guide clients through rough waters. Agency president Michael Fineman is ranked among the nation’s top crisis counselors.

Fineman PR works extensively on reputation building, crisis preparedness, crisis communications and reputation recovery with a wide range of organizations, from schools and municipalities to small food companies and Fortune 500 corporations.

Fineman PR’s successful, high-profile crisis work includes addressing the public’s perception about avian influenza for a West Coast poultry producer; managing consequences from the Santa Barbara “Tea Fire” for a college beset by the firestorm; initiating client-community relations after a tragic apartment complex explosion in Truckee, California; putting a juice company on firm public footing immediately after an E. coli crisis; setting the record straight after media slander of packaged salads; helping resolve labor relations for a highly prestigious medical group in Southern California; and working for so many other clients whose names were successfully kept out of the news.

Our production staff includes full time editors and camera crews anywhere in the USA and even overseas. We have forged agreements with major syndicated TV networks to guarantee PR content will air and be seen by millions of viewers.

We do SMT’s, RMT’s, IMT’s, B-rolls and Integrated Marketing. We are already working on SMT’s for the Consumer Electronics Show and Toy Fair in 2016.

Many companies or institutions will confront unforeseen events that could alter their future, pose unprecedented challenges and potentially set them on a new course that will redefine the organization and significantly impact key stakeholders. What is required in these circumstances is an expert, experienced strategic communications partner to work with senior management and a Board of Directors to: articulate a new business strategy and a vision for success; explain an enterprise-transforming event and its significance; successfully navigate complex business challenges or crises; build trust and support among key stakeholders; and strengthen the organization’s credibility, reputation, and brand.

Successful execution requires superior counsel, judgment and expertise, broad experience, and a comprehensive, effective and intelligent approach for communicating to all stakeholders. For over 45 years companies and institutions around the world have selected and relied on Kekst to provide that counsel and support across a wide range of disciplines including: corporate & financial communications; specialized investor relations; mergers & acquisitions, shareholders activism & corporate governance; IPOs & spinoffs; crisis communications; bankruptcy and restructurings; and litigation and regulatory support.

Michael Layne, Managing Partner

Marx Layne professionals have years of experience handling crisis communications issues. We are frequently retained by leading national law firms to help them guide their clients through the media frenzy that often erupts during a company’s most trying times.

Critical issues from industrial accidents, death on the premises, food-borne illness and environmental pollution, to boycotts, strikes and corporate fraud have all been expertly handled by our senior executives.

During crisis events, Marx Layne crisis counselors are on call 24/7/365. Our team members are experienced in working with legal advisors, police departments and municipalities while keeping company executives apprised at all times of the crisis situation as it unfolds.

We also train company spokespersons in the development of key speaking points and delivery of messaging. Using the latest media technology, our executives tap into the power of social media to monitor sentiment and provide direction on how to protect and manage the client’s brand. Additionally, we understand how to leverage social media tools as part of an arsenal to respond rapidly, whether the crisis occurs in Detroit or in any other region of the nation.

From privately held entities to Fortune 500 companies, Marx Layne has a twenty-year history of successfully developing proactive, comprehensive crisis communications plans that are in place before, during and after a crisis.

When trouble befalls a brand or organization, reputations can be made or broken in a matter of hours, or even minutes. During this crucial time, a company can protect — even enhance — its standing with its key stakeholders, or it can sustain damage that is widespread and long-lasting.

That’s why clients across industries and around the globe rely on MWWPR, whose crisis counselors possess an exceptional depth of expertise and experience. We help clients with vulnerability assessments, crisis plan development/updates, crisis simulation/media training, communications counsel and on-site support in the midst of incidents. Just as important, our team manages the aftermath of a crisis to restore trust and reputation in a company.

We approach crisis engagements with reputation management best practices, total stakeholder engagement and digital media savvy. Using MWWPR’s proprietary Crisis Action Protocol, we thoroughly and meticulously prepare for any potential crisis, regardless of the magnitude. Our planning carefully considers the impact on all audiences including customers, employees, vendors, shareholders, government officials, NGO’s, community leaders, traditional media and social media. Consequently, when a crisis hits, we can react immediately with a multi-channel approach that addresses the diverse needs of each critical constituency, helping you when you need it most.

Sitrick and Company is widely regarded as one of North America’s leading strategic and crisis communications firms. While it has substantial practices in corporate, financial, transactional, reputational and crisis communications, Sitrick is best known for representing clients facing sensitive issues, including reputation management, complex litigation, problems emanating from short-sellers, mergers and acquisitions and restructurings. The New York Times called Sitrick “The City’s Most Prominent Crisis Management Firm.” Sitrick is not a traditional PR firm. BusinessWeek said, the “firm is known for going atomic on opponents, using ‘truth squads,’ ‘wheel-of-pain’ tactics and high-profile journalists (who write profiles).” The general counsel of a major publicly-traded company wrote simply in an email, “You saved the company, literally.” The firm’s senior executives include former reporters, editors and correspondents from such media organizations as The New York Times, Wall Street Journal, Bloomberg, Barron’s, Forbes, The Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, CBS Television and NBC Television. Sloane & Company

Sloane & Company is a specialist public relations firm that focuses principally on corporate and financial media relations, investor relations, crisis communications, transaction support, business to business public relations, and public affairs. We provide both strategic counsel and tactical support to leading public and private companies, both domestically and around the world. Our clients represent a wide array of industries — healthcare, financial services, technology, telecom, media and travel to name a few. Unlike many smaller firms, we have not built practice specialities limited to one or two industries. Because we enjoy a broad worldview and are students of our profession, we can share different approaches and best practices across our client base.

We believe in building partnerships with our clients. We work quickly and immerse ourselves fully to understand a client’s operations, culture, storylines, opportunities and issues. We then build thoughtful communications programs that deliver the right messages to the right constituencies using the right vehicles.

In the digital and globally interconnected world we live in today, the immediacy of events impacts everything—from seismic global business and policy issues to the seemingly insignificant second-to-second conversations on social media. We all operate “In the Now,” where everything is knowable and sharable as events unfold through the 24-hour news cycle, citizen journalists, content aggregators that prioritize trending topics and stories and, of course, social media.

Our global Crisis practice encompasses a team of senior professionals who possess an unparalleled mastery of protecting corporate reputation in the digital age. Working in partnership with our clients, we understand that preserving corporate and brand reputations are the highest priorities. We ensure that all constituencies that have a stake in the outcome are addressed, and are expert in managing social and digital, as well as traditional media. As such, Weber Shandwick offers the full cycle of issues and crisis management.

Our Crisis practice has provided counsel to many Fortune 500 companies and we meet their needs with expertise and insight. We have successfully managed crises in a wide number of areas including environmental and safety issues, litigation, activist campaigns, political pressure at the local, regional and state level, regulatory actions, operational crises and negative press. We have managed environmental disasters and product recalls, proxy battles, federal investigations, investigative media reports and board disputes.

In addition to strategic counsel, Weber Shandwick offers educational tools and trainings to prepare clients for a potential crisis. Since 2010 we have conducted interactive, multimedia crisis simulations with Firebell, our award-winning proprietary simulator tool, which allows clients the opportunity to stress-test plans and messaging in an environment that mimics real-time social and broadcast media pressures. All of our crisis response trainings are paired with discussions of proactive approaches that can mitigate risk and minimize damage in event of a crisis.

PCI names Koziol Senior VP

Chicago-based agency Public Communications Inc. has promoted Wendie Koziol to the role of Senior VP.

Koziol, who has been with the Worldcom unit for sixteen years, has provided strategic counsel and account management for many of the firm’s largest and most successful campaigns, representing clients in industries ranging from healthcare to education and cultural institutions.

Her work for the agency has resulted in several awards, including a MarCom National Platinum Award for the Museum of Science and Industry’s “Month at the Museum” campaign, as well as a Brand Builder Award from the Publicity Club of Chicago.

Koziol also leads PCI Cares, a program she helped create that promotes the agency’s involvement in volunteer and charity efforts. That program won a national Communites Award for Leadership in Community Service.

She joined PCI in 1999 as an Assistant Account Executive.

Cushman & Wakefield lists Murphy for PR

Stefanie Murphy, who handled global communications for LaSalle Investment Management, has signed on with commercial real estate giant Cushman & Wakefield as VP of Global PR.

C&W in September was acquired by DTZ in a $2 billion deal to mount a global challenge to the industry-topping CBRE Group and JLL.

Murphy, based in Chicago, takes a newly created post overseeing the broker’s worldwide reputation management practices and brand building.

She was stationed in London and Chicago for LaSalle, owned by JLL, and earlier handled comms. for Penrose Financial in London. She was also at CKPR and Edelman in Chicago.

Murphy reports to Corporate Comms. Chief Brad Kreiger.

MPAA Casts Ortman as VP of Comms

Chris Ortman, former VP of Communications and Corporate Affairs for CreativeFuture, has moved to the Motion Picture Association of America as VP of corporate communications.

Ortman takes over for Kate Bedingfield, who stepped down to become communications director for Vice President Joe Biden in August. He reports to EVP for global comms., Laura Nichols, at the trade group for Hollywood’s six major studios.

Ortman was previously Deputy Press Secretary and Spokesman for the US Department of Homeland Security and ran his own shop since exiting CreativeFuture in August. He also was a PR aide at the Democratic National Convention Committee in 2008.

Landry shifts to Tanis as EVP

Michelle Landry, VP of Corporate Communications for semiconductor maker Spansion, has moved to Tanis Communications as an Executive VP.

Landry is charged with growing PR and employee communications practices for the Silicon Valley-based tech agency.

Her resume spans the agency and corporate realms. She directed PR and executive communications for Openwave and was a Senior VP for The Weber Group.

Steinreich signs Seaman

Fort Lee, NJ-based Steinreich Communications has appointed Daniel Seaman, a former Director of Israel’s government press office, as Managing Director of the firm’s Israel headquarters in Tel Aviv.

In the new role, Seaman will be responsible for coordinating the firm’s communications staff, which boasts clients in travel and tourism, healthcare, education, technology and government.

Prior to his decade of service as Israel’s press office director — during which he served under six prime ministers — Seaman was Deputy Director General of Israel’s minister of diaspora affairs. He was also a Spokesman for the Israel Defense Forces and served as an attaché for the country’s minister of foreign affairs in New York.

Steinreich, which was founded in 2002 by CEO Stan Steinreich, now has offices in New York, New Jersey, Washington, London, Los Angeles, Frankfurt and Tel Aviv.

Last year, Steinreich’s daughter, Ariella Steinreich, joined the firm as Media Relations Director.
Disclosing a CEO Illness

By Fraser Seitel

In his youth, 92-year-old Sumner Redstone, executive chairman of Viacom, Inc. and CBS Corp, cut a dashing swath. Young Redstone graduated first in his class at Boston Latin School, graduated from Harvard College and Harvard Law, served as an Army lieutenant in World War II and went on to become a multi-billionaire with media investments in Columbia Pictures, Twentieth Century Fox, Orion, Paramount and finally, Viacom, which he acquired and led after a hostile takeover.

For more than half a century, there was no more powerful figure bounding across the entertainment landscape than Sumner Redstone. But today, even though Redstone continues to serve in executive capacities at both Viacom and CBS and controls nearly 80% of the companies’ voting shares, by all reports, the nonagenarian commands all the power of a kumquat.

In fact, beyond a reported “perpetual desire for steak and sex” — neither of which he apparently is able to tolerate — Redstone doesn’t do much of anything but sit in a darkened bedroom in his 15,000-square-foot Beverly Hills mansion. And therein lies the problem, especially if you’re a Viacom or CBS shareholder.

Redstone, and those who control his affairs, have steadfastly refused for him to step down from his executive chairmanship. The Viacom board claims he remains “mentally capable.” At the center of the confrontation between corporate personalities and shareholders — certain to evolve into imminent lawsuits — is the question of a company’s obligation to disclose the state of top management’s wellness to shareholders.

It’s a public relations issue that has confounded corporate managers, communications counselors and securities regulators for decades.

An obligation to inform

Regulations regarding executive illness are fuzzy. The Securities and Exchange Commission has effectively pointed on requiring companies immediately to announce the status of an executive’s physical or mental health. The SEC does require disclosure when a CEO is “unable to perform his or her responsibilities.” This is the “out” Viacom has used, acknowledging that while Executive Chairman Redstone hasn’t been to the office in two years, he still “listens via phone to Viacom and CBS board meetings.”

Without regulation to guide them, the guiding principle for public relations professionals as to whether and how much to announce is that of “materiality” — whether announcing the state or change of health will impact the buying, selling or holding of a stock.

In Redstone’s case — his former live-in girlfriend has charged in a lawsuit that the Viacom executive chairman is imprisoned in his room, surrounded by plain-clothes security guards, can’t eat or drink, must be carried to and from the bathroom and has all the mental acuity of a cricket — the board does, indeed, have a fiduciary obligation to inform the shareholders.

Steve Jobs’ secret cancer

Redstone’s isn’t the first high profile illness that has been kept secret from shareholders. The most famous recent case was that of Steve Jobs.

The Apple founder may have been a legendary creative and marketing genius, but he cared little for corporate governance and shareholders. As Fortune once put it, “Steve Jobs is considered one of Silicon Valley’s leading egomaniacs.”

As a consequence, Jobs was equally legendary for being secretive about his physical condition. After a bout with pancreatic cancer in 2004 that shook Apple’s stock and shareholders, Jobs and Apple steadfastly refused to update the public on his health.

Cognizant of the reality, the Atlantic wrote that, “Every time he sneezes, shares of Apple catch a cold.”

Ultimately, Jobs and his impotent board — just like the feckless board members drawing large monthly checks at Redstone’s Viacom — decided that the executive’s health was nobody’s business; not even the shareholders who, certainly in Jobs’ case, depended on the CEO’s health to sustain the company’s value.

Jobs was so intent on hiding his illness from the public that in 2009, when The New York Times asked him if the rumors his cancer had returned were true, the CEO denied it and said he suffered from a “hormonal imbalance.”

A day later, Apple “corrected” that falsehood to reveal that Jobs’ medical problems were “more complex.” For the next two years, Apple tiptoed through the raindrops in response to increasing questions about the founder’s health, right up until the moment in 2011 when Jobs took his final “leave of absence” from Apple and died a few months later from the fatal disease he and his company had tried so vigorously to hide for a decade.

Over time, other more enlightened, shareholder-friendly CEOs have taken a decidedly different tack. When Berkshire Hathaway CEO Warren Buffett contracted prostate cancer in 2012, he immediately announced it. So did JPMorgan Chase CEO Jamie Dimon when he was diagnosed with throat cancer in the summer of 2014.

Buffet and Dimon correctly recognized that they work for their shareholders, not vice versa. And their communications counselors recognized that public companies have a responsibility to share such material announcements with the public.

Still, Redstone’s companies resist. Viacom CEO Philippe Dauman, according to the Los Angeles Times, claims he “calls Redstone several times a week to discuss company business.” The Times doesn’t say whether Redstone even answers.

In any event, what’s obligatory now is that Viacom and CBS stop the charade and immediately terminate Sumner Redstone’s management responsibilities on the grounds that he is no longer mentally capable.

They owe nothing less to the shareholders for whom they work.
New tax legislation impacts PR firms

By Richard Goldstein

In October, at The Holmes Report’s Independent PR Firm Forum in Miami, Davis & Gilbert, in conjunction with The Holmes Report, announced the findings of an important survey regarding incentive compensation programs currently being used at independent PR firms. Here are some key survey highlights:

1. 24% of firms reported that their top line revenue had increased by more than 20% over the prior year. 24% reported that their revenues were either flat or had declined by 5% or more. According to DG, this reflects a growing chasm between the fastest growing firms and the slowest growing firms in the industry — the most significant gap DG has seen in the three years they have conducted the survey. Of interest, at least to me, is the practice sector(s) of the fastest growing firms versus the slowest growing firms.

2. Those firms experiencing the greatest percentage of top line revenue growth had moved away from relying on a discretionary annual bonus to employees. Instead, they incentivize employees through either an annual bonus plan based upon pre-determined objective criteria, or a long term incentive plan, or both.

3. For those firms using a long term incentive plan, 60% structured these plans with a performance period of three years or more, and use a variety of objective criteria to determine the amount of payments under the plan. Criteria include firm net income, individual goals for specific employees, firm revenue and firm profit margin. Of these criteria, firm net income was the most used.

4. The PR industry generally has a benchmark that employee compensation should not exceed approximately 60% of revenue. Frankly, most PR firms I meet exceed this benchmark. According to the survey, 22% of the firms indicated that they spend more than 60% of their fee income on employee compensation. However, none of the firms that grew top line revenue by more than 20% spend as much as 60% of their fee income on compensation. I’m guessing that smaller firms may be under compensation pressure to retain key employees. By this I mean their compensation package has to mirror the larger more profitable firms. Accordingly, the compensation to revenue percentage is higher.

Of particular interest is that 73% of firms do not share a portion of the firm’s annual profits with key employees who do not own equity. Even larger majorities do not have a program that allows key employees to buy equity or even a program to grant an equity equivalent to key employees in the form of phantom stock or contract equity.

A phantom stock plan is simply an employee benefit plan that gives selected employees — usually senior management — many of the benefits of stock ownership without actually giving them company stock. Equity compensation is generally used by a startup company. Since most companies lack the initial funds to get high quality employees, they use equity compensation to fulfill this need. Equity compensation is a non-cash compensation that represents a form of ownership interest in a company. Companies that offer equity compensation give employees stock options with the right to purchase shares of the companies’ stock at a predetermined price, the exercise price. This right “vests” with time, so employees gain control of this option after working for the company for a certain period of time. When the option vests, the employees gain the right to sell or transfer the option. This method encourages employees to stay with the company for a long term. While I have seen phantom stock used in the PR industry, I have not seen options used in smaller firms, less than $5.00 to $10.00 million in firm revenue.

A high-performance staffing strategy

Rick Gould CPA, J.D., managing partner of Gould+Partners, wrote a chapter in his book, titled The Ultimate PR Agency Financial Management Handbook. According to Rick, turnover influences a great many costs, and — if allowed to grow too large — eats into costs, productivity and, thus, profits in large bites. More profitable agencies are good at retaining great people, not only because they make servicing clients at attractive rates much easier, but because they add significant value when the agency is being sold.

Implementing a key staff-retention plan is crucial to increasing performance and rewarding loyalty, which ultimately maximizes a firm’s value. According to Rick, a firm is simply worth more when a strong second tier of management exists. The second tier assures bottom-line success when the founding owners leave or phase down their firm participation.

Why equity participation works so well

A key retention technique, according to Rick, is to give discretionary bonuses, but pay them out over three years. If they leave, they lose the balance. In this case the unpaid balance goes into a separate fund to use for future discretionary bonuses.

When used correctly, this and other tools are proven ways to retain key staff.

Tax legislation

The Consolidated Appropriations Act (CAA), which includes the Protecting Americans from Tax Hikes (PATH) Act of 2015, was enacted on December 18, 2015. The PATH Act contains a host of tax provisions that will impact individuals and families and, for the most part, are taxpayer friendly. CAA also contains a few tax provisions outside of PATH.

The following provisions are made permanent: Enhanced Child Tax Credit; Enhanced American Opportunity Tax Credit; Enhanced Earned Income Tax Credit; Deduction for Educator Expenses; Parity for Employer-provided Mass Transit and Parking Benefits; Deduction for State and Local General Sales Taxes (helps those who live in no tax or low tax states); 100% Gain Exclusion for Qualified Small Business Corporation Stock; Qualified Conservation Contribution Breaks; IRA Qualified Charitable Contributions; Favorable Rule for S corporation Donations of Appreciated Assets; Research and Development Credit.

PR news brief

Adelson gets crisis help for Review-Journal purchase

A company controlled by casino billionaire Sheldon Adelson has brought in crisis PR counsel to navigate its controversial purchase of the Las Vegas Review-Journal.

Adelson, a kingmaker in Republican politics, bought the state’s largest paper in December through a shell company, sparking criticism over his conservative agenda and past showdowns with the publication.

The casino magnate, whose ownership wasn’t revealed until days after the deal when the Review-Journal reported the story, hired crisis manager Mark Fabiani to tackle fallout. Fabiani’s assignment is with News + Media Capital Group, an Adelson-controlled entity that bought the paper for $140 million.

Review-Journal Editor Mike Hengel stepped down soon after Adelson’s role was revealed, citing an adversarial relationship with Adelson’s family, according to staff reports.

Among editorial concerns raised by staff was an assignment by the paper’s corporate ownership to track Clark County judges, including one who has been involved in a large suit against Adelson.
Top Obama Aide to head comms. for GoFundMe

Dan Pfeiffer, one of President Obama’s top advisors for communications, has moved to crowdfunding start-up GoFundMe as VP of Communications and Policy. Pfeiffer, traveling press secretary and Communications Director for the 2008 presidential campaign, served in the White House as Comms. and Senior Advisor to the President. He stepped down from the White House in March.

He is based in the Bay Area for Menlo Park-based GoFundMe, which helped raise more than $1 billion for users in 2015.

A venture capital investor group this year bought a majority stake in GoFundMe, valuing the company around $600 million. Chief Product Officer David Hahn said of Pfeiffer’s appointment: “It’s inspiring to see the sheer number of people raising money on GoFundMe to help those around them — their friends, their family, their community. Dan will help us capture and share the amazing stories from these heroes.”

Zeno Group works with GoFundMe on the PR front.

GAO: EPA online campaign broke propaganda rule

The Environmental Protection Agency’s social media campaign supporting clean water legislation violated bans against publicity, propaganda and lobbying by the federal government, the Government Accountability Office said in a December report.

EPA lawyers said the agency did nothing wrong in its PR efforts. The government entity spent around $65,000 on resources for the campaign raising awareness of the proposed Waters of the United States rule, a PR push executed by EPA staff.

The GAO singled out the EPA’s use of the social media platform Thunderclap, which allows users to share a message en masse to a group of supporters, along with a blog post that promoted the message to encourage support of the proposed rule. Similar efforts to tackle blowback against the rule were also called into question by the GAO as the EPA linked to external websites that encouraged users to sign up to support the rule.

Federal law prohibits government agencies from lobbying or producing covert propaganda and self-aggrandizement. In lieu of fines, the GAO instructed the EPA to produce a full accounting of the campaign costs and a report to President Barack Obama and Congress acknowledging the violations.

Bernard Directs PR for Princeton Plasma Lab

Larry Bernard, a veteran writer and PR pro in the healthcare and science fields, has taken the communications reins for the US Dept. of Energy’s Princeton Plasma Physics Laboratory.

Bernard, who took up the Director of Comms. post on Dec. 15, had been consulting for the past year since leaving a senior PR role with the Network for Excellence in Health Innovation in Cambridge.

The Princeton facility, based in Plainsboro, N.J., recently completed the National Spherical Torus Experiment-Upgrade, a major fusion facility that launches an extensive research program. “Communicating its findings and those of our other cutting-edge programs will broaden and deepen awareness of the laboratory,” said lab Director Stewart Prager.

The lab, spawned from a government program to control thermonuclear reactions during the Cold War dubbed Project Matterhorn, is managed by Princeton Univ. for the Dept. of Energy.

Bernard previously worked in the drug and healthcare field, serving as senior comms. manager at Pfizer and Amgen. He also directed public affairs at the Schepens Eye Research Institute at Harvard Medical School and was a PR writer for Cornell University.

Kozakos flies to A4A

Penny Kozakos, Managing Director and 16-year alum of Burson-Masteller in Washington, is flying to airline trade group Airlines for America as VP of Communications in January.

Kozakos is a former journalist who served as a news assistant for USA Today and NBC News before moving to Burson in 1999.

She starts Jan. 4 at A4A under SVP/comms. Jean Medina. A4A claims to rep an industry with a $1.4 trillion domestic impact and 11 million US jobs.

Valeant bolsters PR

Valeant, the US pharma facing scrutiny over its drug prices, has brought in Washington's Vianovo for PR support.

Reuters reported the company also hired the DC law firm Covington & Burling as it faces Congressional probes of its drug pricing.

The politically connected Vianovo is led by partners including former President George W. Bush aide Tucker Eskew, Public Strategies alum Blaine Bull and Martha Stewart Living corporate comms. and IR vet Katherine Nash Goehring.

Bridgewater, N.J.-based Valeant’s shares have taken a beating since both houses of Congress took an interest in its pricing policies this fall. Rising drug prices have also become a political campaign issue in the presidential election, ratcheting up pressure on Valeant and other pharmaceutical companies.

Valeant has worked with crisis and financial specialist Sard Verbinnen & Co. for M&A PR in the past, including its $10.1 billion February acquisition of Salix Pharmaceuticals and failed hostile bid for Allergan in 2014.
Golin merges China with Magic

Golin has merged its China operation into Magic Group, forming GolinMagic.

Golin said the operation includes a staff of more than 150 in Beijing, Shanghai and Guangzhou and evolves from a strategic partnership first formed in December 2013.

Magic Group founder Catherine Zhou called the move a “natural next step” in an ongoing partnership. Zhou (healthcare) and corporate Frank Ren, along with Golin Shanghai GM Sarah Chin (consumer) will lead the venture as managing directors.

Adrian Looi heads digital while Taiwan managing director Rachel Hsueh helms tech for the China venture.

L&C acquires first US firm

Llorente & Cuenca, the PR group focused on Spain, Portugal and Latin America, has made its first US deal with the acquisition of Miami’s EDF Communications.

L&C, which secured private equity backing in June, has made four acquisitions in the past six months.

EDF specializes in Latin multinationals operating the US, US companies with Latin American interests and related matters like M&A in the region. The firm was founded in 2001 by Erich de la Fuente, an Edelman and Burson-Marsteller alum who continues to run EDF.

American takes Vatican PR slot

Greg Burke, an American former journalist who advises the Holy See on communications, has been named Deputy Director of the Holy See Press Office.

Vatican media noted the appointment by Pope Francis puts Burke in a position to head the press office currently under the direction of Rev. Federico Lombardi, spokesman for Francis and his predecessor, Pope Benedict XVI. Burke would be the first American to serve as primary spokesman for a pope.

Burke takes the deputy slot vacated by Rev. Ciro Benedettini. Cruxnow.com, which covers the Vatican, called Burke and Rev. Paul Tighe, who was promoted and now in line to become a bishop, as the “most accessible, and effective, communications personnel in the Vatican, making them natural points of contact not only for media outlets, but also for a wide range of other individuals and organizations seeking to engage the institution.”

Burke was stationed in Rome for 10 years for Time magazine. The Vatican last year formed a prominent committee to make recommendations on overhauling its global communications.

YOU CAN GET SERIOUS ABOUT BUILDING VALUE
(OR YOU CAN TURN THE PAGE)

Let’s talk about building and protecting the value of your company.

Whether you’re being punished by short sellers, activists, or the media or you’re one move away from elevating your business to the next level, success or failure almost always hinges on perception.

We get it, because we live it every day.

We’re ICR: a strategic communications and advisory firm built around senior teams of sector specialized experts; professionals who are as serious about building and protecting value as you are.

And all of our teams bring a highly unique perspective to complex issues given our backgrounds as sell-side analysts, investment bankers, communications agency veterans and members of the media. We understand issues, metrics, peers and perceptions like no other firm.

Ready to finally hire the right firm to maximize your reputation and corporate value? Please visit our website at www.icrinc.com.
