2020 prediction: disconnection

It’s a paradox for the age: How could a world in which information is so readily available account for such an information-poor environment?

I’m guessing the early Internet’s pioneers never imagined the infinite library they envisioned would be packed to the gunwales with bad content. Clickbait, outrage bait, fake news, mindless listicles, hyperpartisan media theater masquerading as political analysis. In 2019, our information highway resembles an information trash heap.

We can debate how things got this way, like how the search engines and social media networks siphoned the ad revenues away from the newsrooms that kept us informed. But consider this: while the information at our fingertips is infinite, there’s one thing that’s definitely in short supply: the time we have to consume it all. As a result, the app makers, streaming services, media companies and social media platforms are competing for our limited attention. And they’re incentivized to keep feeding the machine with junk because that’s the content that gets the clicks. The problem isn’t just them. It’s us too.

Perhaps it’s for this reason that, despite an information surplus, our media vocabulary remains alarmingly stunted, even among young digital natives who were raised with the web: 80 percent of middle-schoolers today can’t tell the difference between native ads and news articles, according to a study conducted by Stanford University (see more on page 9).

The Internet is how we relax, it’s how we socialize. For many of us, it also means we’re constantly connected to our jobs. We’re glued to our devices 24/7; the average smartphone user touches their phones 2,617 times a day, according to a disctout report. Our attention spans are shot. We’re vulnerable to data breaches. And as it turns out, staring at screens all day poses its share of health problems, too. We suffer from increased rates of depression and anxiety. We aren’t sleeping enough. An estimated six percent of us have become literally addicted to the technology we depend on. Month-long social media “cleanses” have become one of the fads du jour. Psychologists offer practices specializing in tech-addiction therapy. Digital “detox” retreats are now a cottage industry.

We’ve lost control over what role technology was supposed to play in our lives. Perhaps it’s for this reason that a majority of Americans (70 percent) are now interested in the idea of “switching off,” according to a recent Two Sides survey. Face it: this isn’t what we ordered. We wanted to be connected, informed, but in many ways, technology has become more of an impasse than a gateway. We’re dumber. We aren’t living in the moment. We’re in a state of perpetual distraction. We’re more ideologically divided, driven into hermetic tribes that merely echo our worldviews. The experiment has failed. And now, some of us want to escape this dystopian nightmare we’ve found ourselves in—or at least have a meal uninterrupted by our phones.

A prediction: I think the concept of disconnection will become a dominant theme next year. People crave presence. They want authentic, analogue experiences. They want to disentangle themselves, minimize tech overload, and you can bet the market will respond to our growing desires to unplug, or at least shrink our digital footprint, in 2020 and beyond.

Consider some of the products that’ve appeared on shelves in the last year. There’s the Light Phone, a cellphone with an e-ink display that doesn’t provide web access or apps (only phone calls, texts and an alarm clock). There’s the Freewrite, a Wi-Fi-enabled, “distraction-free” keyboard that mimics the typewriter technology of yesteryear so writers can’t be tempted to go online. There’s wearable technology that notifies users of incoming calls and texts so we don’t have to keep phones handy. Ironically, a slew of smartphone apps has hit the market that track screen time and app usage or even temporarily block specific apps, sites or Internet access altogether. A quick jog online shows retailers are now even selling ridiculous “digital detox kits,” which include a pouch to store your phone, an eye mask and ear plugs. Some even come with a “fidget cube” so, God forbid, you can have something to do with your hands.

Some of this stuff is nonsense, modern snake oil promising some bespoke “spiritual” experience to the act of logging off. But if necessity is the mother of invention, the prevalence of these products in the market speaks to their demand. We’ve reached a historic moment when the purpose of much of today’s new technology isn’t to offer new solutions as much as recreate the world we willfully replaced. But here’s the thing: I don’t think we’re suffering from analogue nostalgia nearly insomuch as we’re simply craving another kind of experience. As it turns out, people like reality.

“Man is by nature a social animal,” Aristotle wrote, and “an individual who is unsocial naturally … is either beneath our notice or more than human.” It deserves to be said: our use of the word “disconnection” here is a misnomer. The offline world is a highly social place. Certainly, compare it to social media, which confirms many of us aren’t dealing with anything resembling reality at all, and it’s no wonder research shows people who deactivate their social media accounts report improved mood and fewer distractions. People are logging off because they want deeper connections, not in spite of them. We’ve just learned that when it comes to setting boundaries, that’s a strictly do-it-yourself job.

Partisanship drives media distrust

A Pew Research Center study found that Americans who support President Trump and approve of the job he’s doing are least likely to trust the news media.

Partisanship influences how Americans perceive the news media more than any other factor, according to a new study released by the Pew Research Center.

The study, which sought to understand what factors influence public trust in the news media today, suggests that in the Trump Era, a direct relationship exists between Americans’ political party identification and whether they hold a favorable view of journalists and the news media.

Overall, the study discovered that Republicans are consistently more likely to express skepticism of the news media and their motives than Democrats: about a third of Republicans (30 percent) as well as Republican-leaning independents (31 percent) said they believe journalists have “very low” ethical standards, about six times the percentage of Democrats (five percent) and Democratic-leaning independents who believe this.

In fact, the study found that the more a respondent approves of President Trump’s performance, the more likely he/she is to exhibit a distrust toward the media.

For example, among the most fervent Trump supporters polled—those who said they “strongly approve” of Trump’s job performance—40 percent characterized journalists’ ethical standards as “very low.” By contrast, only 17 percent of Republicans who said they only somewhat approve of Trump exhibited such suspicion toward the media, and only 12 percent of Republicans who disapprove of Trump do so.

The study also found that other factors are likely to influence Americans’ trust in the news, including the extent to which that person is engaged with national politics, as well as race (black Americans often exhibit greater support of news organizations and journalists than Hispanic or white Americans), age (older Americans are typically more loyal to their preferred news sources than younger adults) and whether that person expresses greater general trust in others.

None of these variables, however, were such reliable indicators of respondents’ perceived trust toward journalists and the news media as political affiliation.

“No other factors in this study come close to these partisan dynamics in their relationship to Americans’ views,” the study’s authors wrote.

Black professionals say bias limits professional advancement

About 20 percent of black professionals believe that someone of their ethnicity would never achieve a top job at their companies, according to a Center for Talent Innovation study.

The study, “Being Black in Corporate America: An Intersectional Exploration,” found that black professionals were more likely than any other group to encounter racial prejudice at work. While 48 percent of Latinx professionals and 38 percent of Asians said they had experienced racial prejudice at work, that number rises to 58 percent for black professionals.

Not surprisingly, black employees are far more likely than their white colleagues to see the racial barriers that still exist in their companies. Almost two-thirds (65 percent) of black professionals said black employees have to work harder to advance, while only 16 percent of white employees agreed.

Access to company leadership was also a problem for black professionals. While 44 percent of white full-time employees said they have access to senior leaders at work, only 31 percent of full-time black employees said they had similar access.

When it comes to corporate diversity and inclusion efforts, employees across the board say that there is plenty of room for improvement. Only 34 percent of black professionals said their company has effective D&I efforts, and the numbers are little better for LatinX (39 percent), Asian (40 percent) or white professionals (41 percent).

In addition, black full-time professionals think that D&I efforts are disproportionately directed at benefiting white women. Almost three in ten black professionals surveyed (29 percent) said that white women are the primary beneficiaries of D&I efforts at their companies. Only 13 percent of white professionals said the same.
Students can’t tell difference between fake, real news

Young Americans’ ability to critically evaluate information they find on the Internet can be summed up with one word, according to research: “bleak.”

By Jon Gingerich

Most students today can’t distinguish native advertisements from news articles, fake news from actual news or content posted by partisan groups from content posted by unbiased sources, according to a study conducted by Stanford University’s Graduate School of Education.

The study, which took a year-and-a-half to carry out, collected responses from more than 7,800 middle school, high school and college students in a dozen states.

Students were presented with dozens of tweets, ads and articles and asked to evaluate the credibility of that content, and were further asked to verbalize their reasoning as each task was carried out. Researchers discovered that while young digital natives can navigate their way around social networks with ease, they’re “easily duped” when it comes to differentiating fact from fiction.

For one, the study suggests that many students can’t distinguish advertisements from news. Specifically, the study discovered that students had a hard time telling the difference between articles and native advertisements, or branded content that’s been made to resemble editorial content.

In one portion of the study, hundreds of middle school students were presented with the landing page of current affairs site Slate, and were asked to evaluate and identify the varying content contained on that page: articles, traditional ads and native ads.

While 75 percent of students were able to correctly identify traditional ads on the page, an alarming 80 percent erroneously believed native ads were news stories, even though that content was clearly labeled “sponsored content.”

The findings were even more dire when it came to students’ ability to analyze the credibility of claims made over the Internet without evidence.

In another exercise, high school students were presented with an image from a popular photo-sharing site that claimed to show flowers growing near Fukushima Daiichi Nuclear Power Plant that had “nuclear birth defects.”

Few students (less than 20 percent) questioned the source of the post or the photo’s veracity. On the other hand, 40 percent argued that the post provided sufficient evidence of its claims simply because it provided a photo.

Finally, the study found most college students had a hard time detecting potential political bias in claims made over social media platforms.

Students were presented with a tweet regarding gun control posted by liberal advocacy group MoveOn.org, which linked to a poll sponsored by another liberal group, the Center for American Progress. Less than a third seemed able to recognize the potential political agenda working behind this post, even though students were allowed to click on the link as well as roam the web freely to research who these groups are.

Stanford researchers noted that while a great deal of variance is typically seen in studies that poll thousands of respondents, the subjects in their 18-month study displayed a “stunning and dismayingly consistent” across each level of education, be it middle school, high school or college.

“Overall,” researchers wrote, “young people’s ability to reason about the information on the Internet can be summed up with one word: bleak.”
2019 was a year jammed with wall-to-wall breaking news, making it harder for PR firms to chalk up placements for clients. While the media maintained a 24/7 watch of Donald Trump’s Twitter feed, there was a raft of newsworthy items to keep the minds of the American people spinning.

The Google News Labs reports that top searches in 2019 focused on the US government shutdown, Brexit, Boeing’s 737 Max disaster, China/US trade war, Jeffrey Epstein’s alleged sexual abuse/suicide, Hong Kong pro-democracy riots, Hurricane Dorian slamming the Bahamas, Robert Mueller’s Russia meddling investigation, Ukraine, California wildfires and the impeachment.

Focusing on the world of PR, here are some of the highlights and lowlights covered by O’Dwyer’s in 2019.

ICR Inc. acquires Westwicke Partners, a health-centered investor relations firm based in Baltimore with offices in New York, Boston, San Diego, San Francisco and London. Headed by founders Bob East and Mark Krausner, Westwicke’s 30 staffers serve more than 100 clients in life science, medical technology and healthcare.

ICR CEO Tom Ryan combined ICR’s 75-plus healthcare staffers with Westwicke’s group to create the Westwicke, An ICR Company, brand.

Skadden settles Ukraine/Manafort FARA suit. Lobbying powerhouse Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom agreed to $4.6 million to settle a civil suit, alleging that it failed to register as a foreign agent for Ukraine work that was headed by Paul Manafort, president Trump’s former Campaign Manager.

According to the agreement, Skadden contributed to “a public relations campaign directed at select members of the US media,” without filing under the Foreign Agents Registration Act.

Following multiple inquiries from the Justice Dept’s FARA unit, a “partner then at Skadden made false and misleading statements to the FARA unit,” which led it to believe that it was not obligated to file, according to the Justice Dept’s Jan. 17 statement.

The Justice Dept. ultimately determined that Skadden was required to register in 2012 and under the settlement agreement has agreed to do so retroactively. The $4.6 million represents the fees/expenses that Skadden got from Ukraine.

He joined Ogilvy in 2011 following a seven-year run as Edelman UK chief and three years at Hill & Knowlton, where he rose to head the corporate EMEA group.

CEOs say profit, not CSR, is top priority, according to a new study from the USC Annenberg Center for Public Relations and Chief Executive magazine.

About 60 percent of the 210 CEOs surveyed for the study said they were unlikely to communicate about any social issue in 2019. The main communications goal for most of the CEOs surveyed remains the bottom line, with 44 percent saying that selling their products and services is the top message they are concerned with delivering.

Finn Partners captures Small Army of digital pros. Peter Finn’s firm scooped up Small Army, a Boston-based 45-member integrated marketing shop focused on health, financial, technology and travel sectors.

Founded in 2002, Small Army provides strategic planning, brand development, advertising, media buying, content creation, video production and social media management services.

Trust in the U.S. suffers its largest-ever-recorded drop among the general population in the history of Edelman’s Trust Barometer.

The 2019 Edelman Trust Barometer reveals that trust in the U.S. among the general population fell nine points to 43, placing it in the lower quarter of the 28-country Trust Index.

London’s Lansons expands to U.S. via Intermarket. Lansons, a reputation management shop in London, picks up a 51 percent stake in New York’s Intermarket Communications, financial shop co-founded by Matt Zachowski and Martin Mosbacher in 1986, to form an entity with fee income in the $17 million range.

Lansons is expected to acquire full-ownership of Intermarket via the purchase of two more tranches over the next three years based on the performance of the business.

Intermarket, which has 25 clients, ranked as O’Dwyer’s tenth largest financial firm in 2017 with fees of $4 million.

Mark Penn takes command of MDC. The former political advisor to Bill and Hillary Clinton assumed the helm of MDC Partners as his Stagwell Group agrees to pump a $100 million equity infusion into the financially strapped ad/PR company.

Before launching Stagwell, Penn was Executive VP/Chief Strategy Officer at Microsoft, CEO of Burson-Marsteller, co-Founder of Penn Schoen Berland, and pollster/advisor for Tony Blair, Bill Ford and Bill Gates.

China’s embattled Huawei Technologies enlists Larry Weber’s Racepoint Global for PR and crisis support as it takes on the US law that bars American governmental agencies for federal contractors from doing business with the Japanese firm.

Racepoint’s one-year contract covers strategy, media/analyst relations, content, crisis, and social media. Weber, who bills at $320 per-hour, heads Racepoint’s 13-member Huawei team.

Paul Ryan joins Fox Corp. board. The former House Speaker has joined the board of the slimmed down Fox Corp., which has closed the sale of the bulk of its entertainment assets to Walt Disney Co.

Before serving as Speaker, Ryan chaired the House Ways and Means Committee and Budget Committee. He was VP candidate for Mitt Romney’s presidential run.

HHSA probes Porter Novelli. The Health and Human Services Administration slates a review of subcontracting deals flowing from Porter Novelli’s $2.25 million contract with the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

Politico reported March 29 that money from the PR contract went to Republican consultants to burnish the image of Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services Administrator Seema Verma.

Pam Stevens, a media adviser, coached Verma; Marcus Barlow wrote speeches and devised strategy, while Nahigan Strategies’ staffers traveled with the administrator and helped orchestrate announcements, according to Politico.
NRA sues long-time PR firm. The National Rifle Association has sued long-time ad agency Ackerman McQueen and its Mercury Group PR unit for allegedly failing to turn over its business records to justify its billings.

The organization paid Ackerman McQueen more than $42 million in 2017.

The NRA and AM have worked together for decades and created the high-impact “from my cold, dead hands” messaging of the late actor and five-time NRA president Charlton Heston.

Edelman helps Boeing navigate PR turbulence ... Boeing reached out to Edelman in May to map a communications plan to reintroduce its 737 Max to the flying public, once the grounded plane receives regulatory approval to return to service.

A member of Edelman’s corporate advisory team declined comment on the work and referred O'Dwyer’s to Gordon John-droe, VP-Communications, government operations at Boeing.

“While I cannot comment on any particular firms, we engage a number across the world to assist with strategic communications,” he said via email.

Bayer ousts FleishmanHillard. Germany’s Bayer has suspended FleishmanHilllard following reports in France’s Le Monde that it compiled a dossier of about 200 politicians, journalists and scientists who raised health concerns about client Monsanto’s “Roundup” weed killer.

The German pharmaceuticals and life sciences giant released a statement May 12, acknowledging the French media raised the high-impact “Roundup” weed killer.

Verdicts come in clicks in the court of public opinion

From the Hallmark Channel to Boeing to the halls of power, we witnessed scandals in 2019 that put crisis communications professionals to work and put several American institutions to the test.

By Gil Bashe, Kristie Kuhl and Jessica Berk-Ross

Once answers to those questions are determined, communicators must agree. Ensure that everyone in the company’s legal, management, marketing, and sales teams convey the same truths whenever and wherever they interface with customers.

Align

After core messaging has been established, ally with experts who can share and amplify those truths through their platforms. Cultivate and leverage third-party support, ideally before there is an issue. Always remember that whether they agree with your position or have their own point of view, advocacy groups will be called upon to comment. If they have no background, they are apt to play it safe even at your expense.

Assess

During a trial or crisis, it’s vital to monitor in real time for related news. In all crises and legal cases, assessing the mainstream and social media horizon 24/7, preparing and updating standby statements and making executives available for media inquiries is imperative.

Achieve

Think about the end-game, not the struggle! A rule of thumb: Do not panic every time you see unfavorable coverage or blog posts. But do not stand idly by either. Make sure key bloggers and reporters have the right information and connect with them to share facts, especially when they are in complex legalese. Aligning opinions requires that people have accurate information, so act when information is incorrect.

Public relations and public affairs professionals should have a key role in corporate crises situations and keep company officers on track with the company’s values and ome of the institutions that faced a crisis in 2019 didn’t fare so well. One key reason: transparency has entered the Age of Convergence. Social media, the 24-hour news cycle and instantaneous mobile technology connect individuals and lay out narratives side-by-side for all to examine. Suddenly, people who were isolated or compartmentalized can share common experiences and challenge cultural icons, celebrities and CEOs. An individual voice can be magnified exponentially with the addition of a hashtag.

In many cases where scandal rocked a company and would not go away, there are strong similarities. Some companies have not been seen to take real ownership of their mistakes or hesitate in formulating a response, which is seen as walking away from responsibility. Others responded to crises quickly, but with qualifiers and legalese that made the audience feel as though there was no one at the helm, no one responsible, only a team of corporate counselors.

This is seen as a “non-apology” apology. These approaches may seem at first to distance the company that made the mistake from the act itself, but they do just the opposite, tying the perceived offender more closely to their offense. What both responses do is create distance and distrust between the company and its audience.

Charles Darwin wrote that “nature abhors a vacuum,” and human nature is no exception. In this Age of Convergence, if a company leaves any distance, that opening will be filled, digitally and at the speed of a keypad click. Audiences once geographically and demographically distant from one another find themselves on common ground in an online community, disparate digital voices can contribute to a new truth narrative.

For the Hallmark Channel, a convergence of individual perspectives meant one person’s opinion on or experience with discrimination could be affirmed by many others. A few tweets, a blog comment or two, followed by the drumbeat of others adding their voices, turned into such a groundswell of outrage that the network immediately caved to a moral watchdog group and dropped an ad depicting a same-sex kiss in a wedding ceremony.

It’s too soon to tell if Hallmark’s mishandling of their crisis will have long term impact on their bottom line, but in Boeing’s case, the self-inflicted 737 Max crisis, in which the aircraft manufacturer was never fully transparent, has caused a halt to Boeing production and shaken their previously rock-solid image, allowing the EU’s Airbus to overtake them in the market. The scandal will have lasting repercussions and impacts on the U.S. GDP and economy going forward.

Avoiding a reputation crisis is not easy, but companies whether the storm much better when they decide to embrace their responsibility and share transparently. While legal counsellors must be involved during a crisis, it’s critical that a place at the strategy table should be reserved for public relations practitioners—especially when litigation is at hand. Their role in aligning opinions, marshaling efforts with advocacy, lobbying and media/reputation management is what enables clients to guard their hard-earned reputation.

These six pillars of communications offer a framework for understanding and managing the flow of the dynamic.

Authenticate

The first step is to differentiate assumptions and feelings from fact: For example, in liability situations, why were there no cases at dozens of other area hospitals that had also received the same product? How was the product received, stored, handled and administered? Did the hospital in question have a record of safety problems? With patient safety paramount, these questions set the tone for ensuring that people stop pointing fingers and—most importantly—begin to think about how to guard against immediate risks.

Accuracy

Always get the facts right first, and then move fast to disseminate. One company worked diligently to guard its reputation by using the media to show its transparency in determining the facts, and by then working carefully to share its findings openly.

Edelman research shows that the majority of people believe brands can do more to solve societal issues than government. CVS Health put its customers' health first when it became the first national retail pharmacy to stop selling tobacco products in its stores. The result: a drop in tobacco sales for all retailers. Way to go, CVS Health.
Listening: how PR is learning the hardest lesson of all

In an industry characterized by constant change, sometimes the best strategy for ensuring continued business success is to just shut up and listen.

By Nick Bailey

The communications world isn’t exactly light on stereotypes. The suited and slick account guy in the Don Draper mold (in the London ad world, where I spent most of my career, the account lead is still known colloquially as “the suit”), the rose-swilling, sunburned network bigwig cruising the Croisette, the bearded, tattooed creative director (I count myself among their number).

But perhaps none of these clichés is more pernicious and more persistent than that of the larger-than-life PR professional; the laugh-a-minute, loud, life-and-soul of any party (hell, she probably arranged the party); the no-nonsense doer who makes magic happen by sheer force of personality.

Like all clichés, there’s some justification for this one. As someone who spent most of his career in the tangentially-related world of digital creative, I’d rub up against “pure” PR agencies intermittently, usually around the point “our baby” was about to be born.

The injection of this kind of hustle and energy was often critical to the success of initiatives born in the bubble of tech evangelism. There’s nothing quite like an efficient dose of reality from a great PR professional to prepare you for the more bruising dose of reality you’d otherwise receive when the rubber hits the unforgiving road of media and public opinion.

As the world changes around us, however—and as we seek to influence that change through creativity and communication—this narrow conception of what “good” PR looks and sounds like—and, indeed, what PR is even for—is becoming not just outdated, it’s limiting our ability to make genuine impact for our clients, and to claim our proper status in the communications mix.

When I began my creative career in the late ’90s, in the world of startup digital agencies, my qualifications were a fine art degree and a 23-year-old’s completely unjustified confidence in his own ability. Digital was so new that a bit of smart patter was enough to get me through the door: I’d never have got an entry-level job in today’s professionalized Hunger Game of agency careers, much less ascended through it as swiftly as I did (even with the way smoothed, as it no doubt was, by my gender and ethnicity).

Nevertheless, being on the inside of an industry which, over the intervening 20 years, has exploded to dominance, has yielded one or two insights that might usefully apply to the world of earned media.

At the point my career began, the world of “traditional” public relations was arguably reaching its extrovert-fueled zenith, at least in the Anglo Saxon world. PR-driven advertising campaigns were making front-page news in the mainstream press (the Wonderbra campaign was a memorable watermark; whether it was a high or low one is a matter for debate). The industry was awash with money, and there was a general kowtowing to the views of “PR Gurus” as a new cult of “spin doctoring” was born around the reigns of Clinton and Blair.

Arguably, it was the scale of this success, and the complacency which stemmed from it, which has meant that the PR world has been slow to adapt to the disruptive impact of technology and digital media, and the positive change that can come from inviting those who think and behave differently into your organization.

An early challenge for the nascent digital creative industry was figuring out how to bring the necessarily unpredictable, instinctive and chaotic activity of creative endeavors together with the methodical, iterative process of technology development. People from diametrically diverse disciplines were forced to communicate who would in other circumstances most likely never have met; let alone collaborated.

This gave rise to lots of frustration and false starts (fortunately, clients had bigger budgets, less digital experience and more patience than they have today). But it also gave rise to extraordinary innovation, rapid change, industry disruption and leaps forward in the efficiency and effectiveness of advertising efforts.

There’s much chatter on this topic around “right-brained” creatives and “left-brained” tech people. Of course, this is reductive and arguably obscures more than it reveals; everybody boasts a spectrum of capabilities and predispositions, after all. But what this simplification does prove is that we instinctively recognize that these two disciplines require very different mental processes.

What they also require are different structures, resources and support from the employer. An environment that’s great for a creative isn’t necessarily great for a coder, and vice versa. Over the years, successful digital creative and technology companies have built their businesses around these requirements, and created fertile cultures that facilitate contributions from those that process information and express themselves in different ways.

This meant that when change came, these companies were ready to respond and capitalize on it. When Facebook landed in 2004, it was digital agencies and startup specialists that leapt on the opportunity to build capability and expertise, not PR agencies.

In hindsight, this represents an extraordinary missed opportunity. After all, isn’t social media—and especially social media at its inception, when it was all about organic, not paid reach—the ultimate word-of-mouth, earned channel?

The fact that the PR industry largely sat on the sidelines of the digital revolution and has only recently leaned in to provide valuable expertise and insight is perhaps a reflection of that typically human pattern to double-down on the strategies that delivered success for you in the past in order to respond to novel challenges arising in the present.

If the extraordinary success of digitally-driven business over the last two decades proves one thing it’s this: you can’t predict or plan for the future, but you can build for it. By fostering cultures that welcome contributions from people who think, create, problem-solve and express themselves differently from the majority—which in the PR world means the charismatic extrovert—organizations become more responsive, adaptable and creative.

The most important lesson for me as a creative working with technology people was the insight it gave me into the limitations of my own approach. It challenged my assumptions about how things “should” be done and—most importantly—gave an understanding that there are different ways of seeing the world, which I had not considered before.

For an extrovert like me, that was the hardest skill I ever learned, and one which I still struggle with today: the ability to shut up and listen.

How technology redefines crisis readiness

Technology tools are meeting a new set of professional demands in the digital era.

Any crisis communications manual relegated to a binder on the shelf is bound to gather dust. Many organizations’ strategies—too outdated and dense to be useful—languish virtually untouched on an office shelf or in a forgotten shared drive.

Unsurprisingly, research suggests that the era of the smartphone has ushered in dramatic change in the way we process information. Recent analysis published in World Psychiatry reveals that Internet and technology use has shortened the average person’s attention span and even taken a toll on memory processes. This is no shock to the growing majority of multitasking Americans, 81 percent of whom now own smartphones, according to the Pew Research Center.

Despite the waning attention span, today’s digitally native professionals come equipped to adapt to cutting-edge interfaces and process information through user experience—presenting new methods for crisis preparedness and crisis management. Or at least, they should.

While rapid changes in technology have clearly altered the scope and cadence of crises themselves, it’s imperative that those managing these scenarios use technology that keeps up with the digital age—rather than solutions from a bygone era—to train for and execute good crisis management. These technology solutions—from online training to software platforms and apps—ensure that a carefully crafted plan is properly disseminated, understood and accessible at the swipe of a finger.

Promoting engagement

One of the largest barriers to implementing a crisis management strategy is moving past plan creation to ensure the leaders executing during a crisis understand both the plan and their individual roles. Online training modules can help ensure adoption of the new crisis plan by serving as an interface for the user to engage with directly (not requiring a trainer), designed to be visually engaging with customized, digestible content. Essentially, management teams need to meet their end users where they live—on their phones, tablets or computers. No one is scrapbooking their photos in 2020.

Issues management teams—and the plans themselves—are also increasingly put to the test through crisis simulations. By coming together and walking through a potential crisis specific to their business, the crisis response team experiences the onslaught of demands that come with a reputational challenge, as they field reporter requests, questions from employees, investor asks, enrag ed tweets and regulatory inquiries in real time. This act of “socializing” the strategy through a simulation provides an engaging opportunity for team members to learn by doing—in a way that is true to life, and not a soulless, paper-driven exercise. Simulation software has streamlined the process, facilitating these exercises in a contained, secure environment.

Expanding accessibility

Whether a multinational with operations around the world or a small localized business, companies increasingly require solutions for remote and/or mobile workforces. In the U.S. alone, remote working has increased 44 percent over the last five years, according to statistics published by FlexJobs.

Training modules and crisis simulations can now be administrated to employees anywhere in the world, breaking down barriers that once prevented scattered teams from staying up to speed on available resources and individual expectations during a crisis. We’ve moved beyond simple conference calls, and crisis management teams are all the better for it.

By providing a virtual war room, crisis management apps offer the option to connect remotely—bridging potential gaps for geographically dispersed organizations and enabling flexibility in scheduling across time zones. While business travel and a remote workforce could have previously prevented a crisis team from executing in sync, the ease of a mobile app connects leaders on-the-go. And that’s a good thing, because it’s rare that companies can ensure real-world crises hit when teams are parked at their desks.

Even the most well-crafted communications strategy is useless if it’s not readily accessible during the critical moments of a crisis. A crisis app houses plans under easily navigable issue icons, keeping crucial strategies at a professional’s fingertips. From locating team contact information to identifying the right talking points, apps organize key components of a crisis response strategy for swift execution.

Ensuring efficiency

Perhaps technology’s largest contribution to crisis management is increased efficiency. Once created for a crisis plan, online training modules require minimal future additions. The team can easily track who has completed the online training, conduct refresher courses and onboard new personnel. Simulation software automates the process and eases the burden of building manual simulations, in addition to providing important data for evaluation post-simulation. All of this lends an important continuity to crisis readiness across the organization.

The crisis management app is, to me, the holy grail of where we’re trying to move businesses when they consider organizational crisis readiness. It categorizes information and makes sure everyone is working from the most up-to-date documents and resources available. It restricts various permissions to ensure participants do not stray from their areas of responsibility, preventing duplication of efforts in the process. It also ensures the content of a crisis plan is digestible, making a scenario plan mobile-friendly by homing in on only the most essential and functional content. Consider running an airline; now consider how difficult it would be to reach a disparate workforce responsible for crisis response without a resource that sits on a flight attendant’s phone.

Further, by design the app automates and insists on arguably the most important aspect of effective crisis management: collaboration. Through notifications, secure chats, polling and shared checklists, the crisis management team can act as a cohesive unit focused on reputation management, strategy development and stakeholder outreach.

Crisis communications technology solutions are now cornerstones of modern issues management. The capabilities associated with these technologies meet the demands of a crisis team in the digital era. Just as rapid changes in technology have created new crises such as data breaches and viral social media events, so too have they expanded the crisis communications toolkit. We can be thankful for that, if skeptical of the practical utility of some of the gifts of the digital age. These new offerings maximize preparation and streamline...
Preparing for a year of crisis opportunities (and threats)

In an era characterized by the rapid dissemination of information online and over social media, even the slightest reputational flame can rapidly spread, engulfing a company before it has time to dial 911. When that first spark becomes visible—whether confidentially or in the public arena—company leaders must be prepared to immediately implement a carefully-calculated response to lessen the initial impact.

By Phil Denning

I t’s impossible to know where the fires will erupt in 2020—faulty airplanes, college admission scandals, more “Me Too” moments, the recent Hallmark Channel advertising fiasco, or perhaps some Presidential election tweets—but there’s no doubt that the embers are already smoldering. While these aren’t the items we want on our typical “holiday list,” it’s prudent to do a quick refresher as we enter the New Year.

Generally speaking, every crisis will share some basic characteristics: it’s an unplanned, negative event—whether real or broadly perceived to be true—that’s public and sufficiently serious to have a meaningful impact on the business:

Unplanned. Crises are difficult to entirely prevent or immediately control, as by their nature they typically arise suddenly and unexpectedly.

Negative. A crisis adversely impacts the company, or has the potential to adversely impact the company if publicly known.

Public. While some crises can be handled internally, all have the potential to impact operations should they become public, while those that are already publicly known are particularly threatening.

Serious. Many crises threaten a significant or lasting impact to the business if handled ineffectively.

These events can take many forms, and companies may face crisis issues at every phase of a business. They can run a broad gamut across business verticals and personnel activity—including executive malfeasance, data security, litigation or regulatory sanctions, HR issues, natural disasters, product failures, workplace violence or many others—that can be reputational, operational or financial in nature. All three types can prove critically damaging to a brand.

Your response to a crisis can define your brand—for better or worse

Stakeholders and consumers can forgive corporate mistakes or transgressions, provided the company responds appropriately, but they also possess long memories for botched or nonexistent responses. Decision-makers and executive teams facing a crisis must think and act quickly, but must also think and act strategically.

The primary goals of crisis management are to limit the damage, preserve the company’s relationships and reputation and establish a foundation for recovery, enabling the business to return to normal course as soon as possible. In order to achieve these goals, decision-makers should adhere to the following principles of crisis response:

Speed. Response teams must move as quickly as possible to prevent rumors and speculation from filling the communications vacuum.

Control. Aim to take the initiative and lead the story before others define your narrative for you.

Knowledge. It’s critically important that your first communications are honest and factually accurate. Teams must immediately identify the essential information pertaining to the situation, including who’s involved, what occurred, where and when the crisis presented itself, and how it escalated.

Thoroughness. Provide all information relevant to the crisis at the same time. Don’t allow updates to continue to trickle out over weeks or months; releasing information reluctantly only drags out coverage of the crisis in the media. Close the information and media loop as soon as possible.

Honesty. Be clear about what you know and don’t know, and never speculate or tell misleading half-truths. This approach conveys arrogance and challenges adversaries to uncover the full story. Additionally, a company’s response to a crisis can define the public’s perception of the brand. Reaffirm why your brand deserves the public’s trust.

Evolve. Constantly monitor all activity and coverage around the crisis, and be ready to take a new angle. Even the most prepared communications team can be surprised as events unfold, so be nimble and adjust to unforeseen developments.

Executive teams must keep these principles front of mind as they craft response strategies. Taken together, these principles boil down to the critical importance of prompt, open and transparent communication with stakeholders and with the public.

Companies in crisis are most able to regain the public’s trust when they explicitly communicate the precise steps they are taking to address the situation, and actively demonstrate that these steps will lead to a successful resolution of the matter. Communicating process, in the absence of complete knowledge or facts, indicates to the public that you’re not ignoring the problem and that you intend to be responsible guardians of your brand and your consumers’ trust.

How you do it is just as important as what you do

Finally, with these response principles and objectives in mind, companies should consider the following when actually crafting and delivering communications in response to a crisis:

Timing. While the first 24 hours are critical in defining your response, it’s just as important to continue to monitor and manage the ongoing flow of news to provide sufficient commentary to maintain control of the narrative and avoid a news vacuum that might otherwise get filled by erroneous or speculative commentary.

Clarity. Refrain from theorizing or thinking out loud, stick to the facts as you understand them and update as appropriate going forward. Provide written statements where possible to ensure that your message is clearly disseminated, and avoid making statements that you may have to correct or contradict later on. Remember you’re typically speaking to a broad public, so limit the use of industry jargon and speak in plain language when possible.

Empathy. Nothing is more important than expressing genuine concern for whatever has happened and those who may have been impacted. The public can forgive error, but it will have no tolerance for apathy or indifference. Sometimes this will necessitate providing a human face for the company in its communications. Choose wisely. And demonstrate that concern through both words and deeds.

Accountability. Accountability isn’t the same as responsibility. Nothing is more frustrating in the aftermath of crisis

How 2020 will drive a communications transformation

Some insights regarding what the new year holds for communications.

By Jenn Deering Davis

This year, we’ve read about influencer fatigue, politics fatigue, social media fatigue, content fatigue and probably a dozen more kinds of fatigue. We’re also drowning in data, we’ve been told the press release may or may not be dead and trust in the media remains low. It occurred to me that an appropriate phrase to describe the age might be “everything fatigue.”

Granted, this notion of “everything fatigue” seems like an unnecessarily negative way to frame what’s going on in communications right now. We’re in the midst of a communications transformation! And yes, transformation is hard: it requires perseverance, dedication, resilience, adaptation. But the effort is worth it, as earned media is becoming more strategic, more measurable and more essential than ever before. For those of us who work in comms, PR and marketing, we’re in the middle of something truly special.

So, what’s driving this transformation? How is the landscape changing and what do we see becoming more important in 2020?

The lines between PR and marketing will dissolve

What’s the difference between PR and marketing? Is it about where your audience is in the sales funnel? Or is it about your ultimate objective as a team? Who owns content in your organization? Who owns reporting?

SHIFT Communications has a great definition of the difference between PR and marketing: “The goal of public relations is to create awareness and trust. The goal of marketing is to create demand for our products and services.”

PR agencies already provide a number of services historically provided by marketing: design, content, social, video, analytics. But who ultimately owns the brand? Truthfully, it’s a combination of both PR and marketing, and the lines between those functions will continue to blur into 2020 and beyond.

USC Annenberg’s 2019 Global Communications Report found that 51 percent of communicators expect more integration with marketing over the next five years. The functions have so much to offer each other—analysis of what’s working and what isn’t, data to inform attribution models, technology both teams can utilize, and even moral support in the face of shrinking budgets.

Part of what this means is that PR professionals need to ensure they can speak the language of marketing so they’re prepared in the years to come. It will be even more crucial to understand metrics, paid strategies, attribution, product positioning, technology, and most importantly, selling. The aforementioned Global Communications Report found a huge difference in the importance CEOs and in-house communicators place on selling products and services—44 percent of CEOs report selling as the most important marketing issue for their orgs, but only 25 percent of communicators felt the same. To remain relevant in the eyes of the C-Suite, communicators need to think even more about how to actually sell their company’s product.

Further, the boundaries between paid media, owned media, and earned media are increasingly permeable, and any particular type of media may have more than one owner. Ultimately, the lines between PR and marketing are blurry at best (and arbitrary at worst). They will continue to evolve in 2020, and even more so over the next decade.

The corporate marketing landscape will experience significant change

Comms. isn’t the only function undergoing significant change right now; marketing is experiencing an evolution as well.

Some companies are going as far as eliminating the CMO position in favor of the roles of the Customer or Chief Experience Officer and Chief Information Officer. Part of this is driven by yet another blurring line—the line between prospect and customer.

Traditionally, we think of comms. as serving the top of a sales funnel—generating initial awareness, maintaining reputation, and monitoring for crises. And then as someone progresses into the funnel, marketing takes over—converting awareness into leads. But once a prospect actually becomes a customer, who owns that relationship? Many marketing departments have a customer marketing team, who focuses on sharing education content, nurturing clients, and finding opportunities to upsell. However, in other cases, these activities are owned by customer success or account management. This has led some companies to eliminate the CMO altogether.

For PR pros, this comes back to one of our first questions—if you’re in public relations, who is your audience? How is this different from the marketer’s audience? And what does the shift in how (some) companies think about marketing mean for the future of public relations?

Now’s the time to determine what data you already know about the crisis facing the news media industry; newsroom jobs have declined, fake news and misinformation is on the rise, and media organizations have merged or disappeared. While we’re not going to get into all of that here (there’s tons more information on Pew Research’s State of the News Media site if you want to read more on this), let’s talk about what this means for the relationship between PR and media.

For a PR professional, it can be hard to keep up with media contacts, many of whom may move around frequently or write for multiple publications. Publications you’ve come to rely on are acquired or shut down. Journalists are under pressure to produce more content, and many receive hundreds of pitches every week.

Couple that with the increasingly complex role of social media in news. According to Pew Research, 62 percent of U.S. adults say “social media companies have too much control over the mix of news that people see.” Concerns about fake news, misinformation, and the negative impacts of microtargeting further complicate the relationship between PR and media.

And how about influencers? Despite some public setbacks, influencer marketing continues to grow. Business Insider estimates that the influencer marketing industry will be worth as much as $15 billion by 2022. Social influencers are still very important to any comms. strategy. But there are millions of influencers—ranging from celebrities with 50 million followers to nano-influencers catering to a tiny but very niche audience. Influencer relations are more complex because it’s another function that straddles the PR and marketing teams. Who owns the influencer relationship in your organization?

All of this points to an evolution in the relationships communicators have with traditional media and social influencers.

The CEO’s role in a crisis

To speak or not to speak: should your CEO be your spokesperson in a crisis?

By Ashley McCown and T.J. Winick

Your organization is facing a serious threat. Its reputation—and perhaps its very existence—hang in the balance. Having shepherded clients across sectors and industries through hundreds of crises, we have witnessed the time, energy and resources it takes for leadership to respond effectively at these pivotal moments. While advance planning helps inoculate your leadership team against some of these costs, the demands of an unfolding crisis can easily derail a chief executive’s daily schedule.

While the CEO should oversee or designate a senior team member to manage the situation, the question of who should communicate to internal and external audiences, i.e., to manage the perception of the organization during a crisis, is a topic of much debate. Just as there is no single strategy for how to respond to these urgent matters; the role of your CEO at these moments of truth is complex and often dynamic, with the need to adapt in real-time to an ever-changing reality.

There are several factors that determine whether or not your CEO should be the chief spokesperson in a crisis. Here are five considerations, along with some real-life examples that demonstrate their importance:

Ability to relate: This should be the determining factor for most organizations: Is your CEO relatable, and if not, can training help? In a crisis, the CEO needs to communicate “we get it” by projecting empathy and compassion; but don’t assume communicating effectively under pressure is a skillset every leader possesses. Relatable may also mean understanding the culture of a different geographic region or country where an incident occurred. If the CEO doesn’t speak the language, literally or figuratively, it’s likely best to go with someone who is more relatable to those local audiences who matter most.

Teachable moment: The often-cited example of a CEO who failed to communicate empathy is BP’s Tony Hayward who uttered, “I just want my life back,” during the Gulf Oil Spill of 2010. However, there are many more examples of CEOs saying the wrong thing—or, equally as bad, nothing at all—at the wrong time. When a United Airlines passenger was dragged from his seat and bloodied aboard a 2017 flight because he refused to get off a plane that was overbooked, a passenger video of the incident went viral. United’s CEO was then predictably condemned when his statement read, in part, “I apologize for having to re-accommodate these customers.” The language smacks of legalese, and lacks empathy for the injured passenger, or remorse for how he was treated by the airline.

Read and react: First, ensure the crisis is of a certain magnitude; having the CEO be public-facing for a minor crisis risks over-exposure and can even escalate that minor situation into a major one in the eyes of your key stakeholders. At the same time, when there’s a crisis in which the CEO must act as spokesperson, make sure he/she is seen and heard from at the appropriate moment(s). Waiting days or even weeks to comment only leads to the appearance that they were pressured or publicly shamed into commenting when they finally do.

Teachable moment: Facebook’s Mark Zuckerberg was roundly criticized when he neglected to comment for weeks after a crazed and hate-filled gunman livestreamed his New Zealand mosque attacks on the social network. Because the CEO didn’t speak about the shooter using Facebook as a platform to broadcast his attacks—or what safeguards can be put in place to prevent such disturbing content—he and his company were perceived as insensitive and uncaring. Remember that tragedies, especially involving fatalities, will almost always require an expression of sympathy and remorse by the CEO and a vow to never let whatever took place happen again.

Subject matter expertise: If the CEO doesn’t have a depth of knowledge in the area at the heart of your organization’s crisis, then he/she will presumably have a hard time sufficiently answering all the questions the press may have. At these moments, the CEO still needs to be visible to acknowledge that he or she is on top of the situation, while allowing those with the technical expertise (perhaps outside agencies like law enforcement or the NTSB) to address the specifics of what happened and what steps are being taken to resolve the situation.

Teachable moment: When an alligator pulled a child underwater at Disney World in 2015, tragically resulting in the boy’s death, all eyes were on the search to find the child and, on how Disney responded. While its Chairman, Bob Iger, along with the Resort President issued heartfelt expressions of sympathy to the child’s family, the Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission was critical in the response. They provided the insight reporters were looking for: about the alligator threat in Florida, the reptile’s behaviors that led to the tragedy, and what parents can do to protect their children. Disney, meanwhile, managed the crisis by temporarily closing all their beaches and posting alligator warning signs. In the end, it was the swift, responsive and coordinated effort that helped Disney win praise for a compassionate response.

Accessibility: When time is of the essence and/or there are lives at stake, a reassuring statement from someone at your organization is better than no statement at all. If the CEO, who’s typically your chief spokesperson, is expected to be out of the country or unreachable for any reason, there needs to be a designated back-up. It’s absolutely inexcusable to go hours during a crisis without some word from the organization deemed responsible. Don’t wait for the CEO to become available; have the pre-determined alternative spokesperson prepared and ready to assume the public-facing role.

Teachable moment: The CEOs of Columbia Gas and its parent company NiSource were missing in action when a gas line ruptured in the Merrimack Valley of Massachusetts in the fall of 2018. The explosions damaged hundreds of buildings while injuring several and killing one young man. Yet, it took six hours for the company to issue a response—a lifetime in the age of social media. During this gap, the state’s congressional delegation took to social media calling the company out for its lack of communication. When the CEO of Columbia gas did finally appear the next day, he seemed woefully unprepared to provide satisfactory answers to the questions at the top of everyone’s list.

Sufficient media-training: While there is no substitute for communicating during a real crisis, ensuring your CEO is regularly media-trained is the best way to ensure a strong performance and avoid any major gaffes. This means running him/her through videotaped mock-interviews that can be played back and studied. Seeing themselves on camera can be revelatory for the CEO, who may have been previously unaware of areas in need of serious improvement, be they style or substance. Remember: even the world’s greatest athletes need a coach.

Teachable moment: As we’ve pointed out, there have been many poor performances by CEOs when it has mattered most. The damage is self-inflicted for a myriad of reasons: an overreliance on talking points (so it appears as if the CEO was never actually answering the question), being overly combative with the interviewer or—least excusable of all—making themselves the victim in the middle of a crisis in which many are suffering.

Public-facing responsibilities of a CEO depend, of course, on the brand. But one thing you can count on: those who have built up some equity by engaging with the media and being visible in the good times are typically given the benefit of the doubt during a crisis—at least at first. Critically, it helps your CEO achieve a certain level of comfort with the press before a crisis strikes.

Part of our jobs as communications professionals is protecting and defending the organization and its leadership. So remember, when thinking about who should be public-facing during a crisis, ensure that your brand is putting its best foot forward. Who can most effectively convey a sense of calm and control must be part of your plan. Ashley McCown is President of Solomon McCown & Company. T.J. Winick is Senior Vice President at Solomon McCown & Company.

Communications transformation

Communicators will need to be nimbler in maintaining these relationships, think about how they connect with individuals, and be sure they’re continually providing value to keep relationships strong despite the changes and challenges.

These challenges help fuel the work my team and I do, and have me feeling optimistic and excited—not fatigued—as we prepare to enter a new decade. The 2020s will be the decade of the communicator; I’m ready for it and hope you are too.

Crisis opportunities (and threats)

event than finger-point and buck-passing amongst the parties involved. Assert leadership and demonstrate a commitment to doing whatever it takes to fix the problem, find out how and why it happened, and make sure it never happens again (even when it isn’t your fault!).

Finally, the time to review these principles and envision how they apply to your organization is before you experience an incident. Every company should undertake a crisis preparedness planning process that looks at the various threat scenarios they are most likely to face and then organizes hypothetical response plans for each that adhere to these principles.

Response speed is more critical than ever in today’s connected world of instant communication, and the only way to quickly—and effectively—communicate in a crisis is to have fully anticipated and practiced that response in advance.

The future of venture capital and public relations

Why venture capital firms should create more content as a means of attracting better deal flow.

By Todd Barrish

In two previous articles for O'Dwyer's, I've looked at why venture capital firms need to use public relations to stand out in a crowded market, as well as why content marketing is the ideal vehicle to achieve branding goals. As the VC landscape has evolved since that first article was published, it has only become more important for firms to invest in a compelling PR strategy.

The bull market of the last decade has introduced hundreds of new players to venture capital, creating an environment that is attractive for investors and entrepreneurs but challenging for firms looking to stand out from the pack. The balance of power has shifted: while the past saw founders selling themselves to VCs, the current marketplace requires VCs to effectively market themselves to entrepreneurs seeking "smart capital."

The looming specter of a recession could lead to a shakeout in the industry, with only well-built firms surviving what could be a drying-up of capital. The fact of the matter is this: more than 500 venture capital firms are seeking a cut of a limited economic pie. It stands to reason that not every VC is built to last. But regardless of whether or not a reduction in the number of VC players is imminent, it is crucial for firms to solidify their brand and develop a forward-thinking PR strategy.

Investing in expertise

If there's one thing venture capital understands, it's the importance of drawing a good return on investment. By spending the time and money necessary on a smart PR and communications strategy, VCs can reap the outsize benefits of a strong and persuasive public identity, allowing them to focus on what they do best, finding new entrepreneurs and maximizing the return on their capital investments.

What's the best strategy for developing a brand in 2020 and beyond? It starts with a digital story. Both VC firms and entrepreneurs alike now have the tools at their disposal to do their due diligence online, and an ineffective online presence becomes an immediate weak spot for either party looking to stand out. Your most important public-facing touchpoints—your company website, LinkedIn page, and even the LinkedIn profiles of your executives—should each tell a clear story of who your firm is and who you serve.

A strategic and consistent PR campaign ensures that your firm's story is fresh and relevant, including a healthy dose of smart content marketing which is both informative and, most importantly, current. Writing a blog about how "AI is coming" or talking about "pivoting to video" will only show that your brand is out of touch and relying on buzzwords.

Effective VC public relations aligns the firm's marketing with the industries it serves, with particular emphasis given to the VC's visual identity. A recent Wall Street Journal article highlights this trend: if a VC serves creative industries like fashion and luxury goods, their visual brand should match that aesthetic in tenor and tone. Likewise, if your firm works exclusively with fintech, you're going to want to develop a brand that exudes precision and agility. Your visual brand becomes an even greater challenge if you work with more than one industry: clever aesthetic choices can ensure that you're making the right first impression regardless of the entrepreneur, while visual elements narrowed to one industry could shut you out of other opportunities.

Perhaps the most important element of VC branding is consistency. As you expand your touchpoints across multiple platforms and publications, you'll want to ensure that you're conveying a single, clear message. Develop and create thought leadership that dovetails with your industries and your image, anticipating the next big thing and delivering actionable information. The benefit of establishing your firm as an industry leader can't be overstated—just ask Andreessen Horowitz if they regret investing in branding and content.

Leveraging the analytics boom

As we move into 2020 and beyond, VC public relations will also need to integrate more and more data for effective performance. If you are making the effort to develop content around your business, you should go the extra mile to understand how your content is working. What are your followers paying attention to? What content is driving the most engagement? How are you stacking up against your competitors? And how else are you leveraging your content beyond posting it online? Data analytics can help you to experiment with different platforms for sharing your thought leadership. Today's startups and entrepreneurs are all over social media—you need to be, too. This is another area where your marketing efforts should be in harmony with your potential partners: you are more likely to catch the eye of a tech startup on Instagram than LinkedIn, so cover your bases accordingly. And if you don't have your finger on the pulse of every 21st century social media feed, that's perfectly fine, as long as you're engaging the help of someone who does.

Data can also be used proactively. What insights can you garner from past posts to further enhance your content creation? Gauge your content strategy's success over time using metrics that can guide you towards future topics that really connect with your audience. Well-designed data analysis ensures that your firm's story is fresh and relevant, including a healthy dose of smart content marketing which is both informative and, most importantly, current. Writing a blog about how "AI is coming" or talking about "pivoting to video" will only show that your brand is out of touch and relying on buzzwords.

Three key takeaways

Play to your strengths: Don't try to be all things to all people. Identify your niche and become the leading voice in your area of expertise.

Mirror your audience: Make a good first impression with your visual identity and content. Persuade your target industry that your firm is a perfect fit.

Know thyself: Every new piece of content should be followed by thoughtful analysis. Create, analyze, adjust, repeat.

With more competition than ever before, time has run out for venture capital firms to wait for entrepreneurs to come to them. VCs must invest in PR and adopt a well-informed, forward-thinking strategy if they want to win in 2020 and the years to come.

Crisis Communications Tailored to Every Stakeholder

When dealing with the unexpected, getting the right message to the right audience at the right time can be a challenge.

That's why Stanton builds comprehensive communications strategies that ensure our clients are fully prepared before, during and after a crisis hits.
Navigating the shifting public expectations of a crisis

Five questions all organizations should be prepared to answer if they want to regain public trust following a reputational crisis.

It’s no secret among communications professionals that news travels faster than ever. The cycle of news stories is getting shorter as a result, but with the spread of digital-native publications and the dominance of social media as a news source, there are also more ways for a crisis to gain oxygen.

This new environment also increases the number of stakeholders who expect to be heard or have a seat at the table when a crisis arises. From policymakers to consumers to employees and far beyond, your organization must be deliberate in addressing the different concerns and expectations held by each stakeholder audience.

Further, individuals are paying increased attention to how organizations respond to crises. The general public is in the driver’s seat, and their expectations have the power to shape responses and improvements for organizations experiencing a crisis.

There’s no doubt that this has changed the crisis response playbook. Previously, audiences typically wanted organizations to simply acknowledge their wrongdoing and address the issue before moving on. But today, audiences not only want organizations to acknowledge their wrongdoing, they also want assurances that the organization has made appropriate long-term changes for the better, often outside of the scope of the original issue.

Just look at the story that broke in November about Google collecting personal health data in collaboration with a large hospital system, without notifying patients and physicians. This specific partnership went under the microscope of policymakers and resulted in additional scrutiny toward other acquisitions Google has made in the health space, such as Fitbit, and how the company plans to protect that personal data.

Google argued that its work “adheres to industry-wide regulations,” and that may be true, but stakeholders including data privacy experts, U.S. senators, consumer advocates and Google users called on the tech giant to go above and beyond the standard requirements and evolve its data collection practices.

This example illustrates that being properly prepared to respond to a crisis or issue has never been more critical. Regularly evaluating crisis response materials to ensure that staff clearly understand their roles and have participated in crisis communications simulations before an issue hits is now a requirement, not a luxury. Evolving scenario plans on a quarterly or even monthly basis to anticipate what areas of reputational risk may enter the public domain should be table stakes. Without it, you’ll be caught flat-footed when a crisis occurs.

In addition, response plans must go beyond a statement simply shared with the media. The Pew Research Center has chronicled the rapid rise of social media as the top news source for Americans over the last decade, and nearly 60 percent of Americans get their news from these sources today. Given that the majority of Americans are getting news this way, organizations have to tailor their messaging to social audiences. It’s imperative to think about how a response will be received online before determining a strategy for more traditional audiences.

Beyond the response itself, public expectations around response speed have also changed. The public now expects a response from organizations within minutes, not hours or days. Without a quick and strategic response to a crisis, your organization’s story will be told without your input, increasing the risk of long-term reputational impact.

So, what do these new, broader audiences want to know in the middle of a crisis? There are typically five questions that the public wants answered to ensure your organization is taking the issue seriously.

What happened?

While this question may seem straightforward, it is often challenging for organizations to understand what entirely occurred in time to develop and share a complete and accurate response quickly enough. And there is nothing worse than an organization providing an intentionally selective view of what happened, or worse yet, providing inaccurate information. While the initial response does not have to include the full picture, it must acknowledge the issue and provide a timeline for when more detailed information will be available in order to appease audiences temporarily.

Who’s impacted?

When navigating a crisis, your organization must clearly define the direct and indirect impact on various stakeholders and what it is doing to help those individuals. You must work from a broad scope and then work to narrow the impacted audiences as you consider each response.

What did you do when you found out?

Given that the public often does not learn of a crisis in real-time, the public will demand to know what your organization did when the spotlight was not on. Meaning, if the organization did little or simply ignored the crisis because there was no public awareness at the time, it will lead to increased reputational risk and additional demands from stakeholders.

What were you doing?

What were you doing?

This question is often ignored when organizations navigate a crisis and is an overlooked opportunity following the response phase. Often, when organizations stop getting frequent media calls or hearing from stakeholders, they believe the crisis is behind them and move on. But your organization must be smarter than this by placing yourselves on a path for long-term recovery to rebuild trust. This means not only addressing the crisis directly via the questions above, but also facilitating broader change for the organization. For example, this could mean advocating for more substantial changes at the policy level or in industry standards, or it could mean a recommitment to your organization’s mission.

Proactively preparing for these questions ahead of time is essential to ensuring that you will address each issue adequately against the new demand for faster, better responses. After all, for large organizations, it’s no longer a matter of if a crisis will occur, it’s a matter of when.

The first five phone calls of crisis communications

Many companies will face a crisis, but many won’t have a communications plan in place when it hits. Namely, few will be able to answer this critical question: When a crisis occurs, who do you call first?

Crisis PR experts love to talk about the value of scenario planning exercises: setting aside time and resources to imagine various potential calamities and how best to handle them. But, while it’s always great to be as prepared, the people and companies faced with a communications crisis are often not the same as those that happened to invest in planning for just such a scenario. So, when they reach out for PR help, there aren’t existing PowerPoint decks to consult and phone notification chains to kickstart a response.

Culled from our experience with clients, stakeholders and lawyers we’ve worked with, as well as years spent working on the journalism side of the game, below are key learnings from BerlinRosen’s Legal Affairs and Crisis Communications practice—where we advise clients ranging from law firms, global corporations and high net-worth individuals to nonprofits and advocacy organizations—on the first five phone calls to make in order to survive the crisis.

Reporter(s)
The single most important phone call to make or return is to the very people that are coming after you. Avoid the head-in-sand approach and engage directly with the reporter(s) that are chasing or already writing the story. The goals of that initial contact are to: (1) open a line of communication so they know who to come to for information, (2) extract all you can about what they know and when/how they’re planning to report it and (3) understand whether they’re receptive to receiving background information in addition to actual statements. Resist the temptation to hide from reporters in hopes that the story goes away—it rarely does. The only real risk of engaging with the reporters is the (negligible) difference between stories that say “declined to comment” instead of “could not be reached for comment.” In exchange, you gain critical insight into their reporting that can shape your response. Furthermore, if you ignore a reporter but then take issue with a story after it posts, it will be much more difficult to change or influence the piece. Any reporter will be less receptive to your arguments after the fact.

C-suite leaders
The most precious commodity in a crisis situation is time and you don’t get much of it. The best service you can provide to clients is helping them understand that, today, “rapid” response will almost always need to be faster than they would prefer. Even initial conversations about the best course of action should be had with the actual decision-makers, rather than beginning with mid-level personnel which must then float proposed steps up the corporate ladder.

Relatedly, those conversations can’t wait until the next day or even “later today.” Rapid response will almost always need to be faster than a client would prefer. It means getting an initial statement into the earliest write-ups—and in a prominent place within them—because those are the ones that will proliferate on social media and set the tone. It means getting on conference calls at 10:00 p.m. because that’s when the next day’s New York Times story comes online with new comments from an adversary that may—or may not—merit a response.

The lawyer(s)
One of the most critical rules in crisis communications is that you don’t want to make a bad situation worse. Looping in a company’s legal counsel, whether in-house or outside (or both), is a critical component to not breaking that rule and bringing them into the fold right away serves several key purposes. First, lawyers often know where the bodies are buried and a critical component to a good crisis plan is to gather all available information as quickly as possible. Relatedly, any public statements should be vetted not just in the context of the immediate situation but also with an eye towards litigating a matter in the long term. Crisis communications is both a short game and a long game and you need to make sure that your short game doesn’t create problems down the road.

Researcher
Whether it’s a member of your own team or someone from the client side, identify and activate someone to research the broadest possible context surrounding an issue. Is the current problem an off-shoot of, or even similar to, a past problem that the client has had? Is it part of a larger trend that might make reporters more likely to cover, perhaps necessitating a more aggressive initial strategy? If the crisis at hand is an “us versus them” situation, are there vulnerabilities that you can leverage? Put simply, assign someone to make sure you know everything there is to know as quickly as possible.

Validator wrangler
Companies and individuals are, by definition, biased about their own crisis situations. So, no matter how pitch-perfect a response might be, having outside validators available to reporters and other key constituencies is an effective component of a crisis response. The ideal mechanism is to identify a specific person that can act as a validator: someone with strong relevant relationships that can marshal support quickly. Whether it’s a current or former employee, client or partner organization, jumpstart this process as one of the first steps to a crisis response.

Prioritizing these five calls, ideally within the first two hours of an emerging crisis, will create the foundation for an aggressive and strategic crisis response.

WITH QORVIS, OWN EACH STAGE
The art of the apology

An overview of celebrities, CEOs and others who’ve attempted to apologize and gotten it wrong shows that when it comes to crisis management, the wrong response can often create a crisis after the crisis.

By Ron Sachs

Elton John’s 1976 song “Sorry Seems to Be the Hardest Word” could be the unfortunate theme for too many organizations that find themselves in the throes of a crisis in which they were slow to own up to the cause of the problem.

In our daily lives, we are accustomed to saying “I’m sorry” for even the smallest personal or professional offense, intended or unintended. But in the C Suites of too many private, public or nonprofit entities, there is often resistance or reticence to timely taking responsibility – for fear of deepening the damage to the brand. Ironically, that delay in shouldering the mistake frequently is the trigger to creating the crisis after the crisis: inaction, insensitivity, inertia that plunges the organization into a worsening, damaging spiral.

In the public relations profession, we are often called on to guide clients through the challenging process of issuing a public apology. It’s so common that the art of the apology has spawned its own sub-genre of books and articles. Who was sorry, sorrier, and sorriest? Who offered the egregious “sorry-not-sorry”? Who had to apologize for their apology?

In today’s 24/7 social media environment, any post or comment can potentially attract global attention, good or bad. Trolls and critics will always find an audience somewhere, so it’s important to accept that no apology will satisfy everyone. Some steadfast rules apply, however, and some high-profile examples provide lessons for how to do it right—or very wrong.

Facing global scrutiny, regulatory action, and significant liability after two deadly crashes of their company’s aircraft, Boeing corporate leadership offered plenty of statements of sympathy. The statements themselves, however, were cluttered with qualifying clauses that seemed designed to deflect responsibility and minimize the gravity of Boeing’s situation. (It’s hard to imagine any Boeing passenger or business customer really being comforted by this kind of language: “As part of our standard practice following any accident, we examine our aircraft design and operation, and when appropriate, institute product updates to further improve safety.”)

A devastating delay of more than three weeks elapsed before Boeing Chairman, President, and CEO Dennis Muilenburg finally took responsibility and apologized (and then kept apologizing): “We at Boeing are sorry for the lives lost in the recent 737 MAX accidents.” It’s a modern textbook example of how not to do it.

In stark contrast, let’s revisit the quick and sincere apology issued by Starbucks CEO Kevin Johnson after two African American men were wrongly handcuffed and arrested at the urging of a store manager in Philadelphia, merely because they were in the store. Almost immediately after footage of the incident went viral on social media, Johnson went public. He apologized, took ownership of the mistake personally, and embarked on a weeks-long apology tour, saying he was sorry in interviews and on virtually every available Starbucks communications channel. He also briefly shut down every Starbucks store to engage all staff in compulsory, renewed sensitivity training.

“The circumstances surrounding the incident and the outcome in our store on Thursday were reprehensible. They were wrong,” Johnson said in a “Good Morning, America” interview only four days after the arrests. “And for that, I personally apologize to the two gentlemen who visited our store.”

Another quick and effective apology came from former NBA player Charles Barkley, now a sports TV analyst, after a reporter tweeted about this weird response to a question: “I don’t hit women, but if I did I’d hit you.”

Not only did Barkley apologize the next day on Twitter, but the reporter retweeted the apology from her own Twitter account. The apology itself is distilled perfection: “My comment was inappropriate and unacceptable. It was an attempted joke that wasn’t funny at all. There’s no excuse for it and I apologize.”

Of course, a quick “apology” doesn’t help if it’s not really an apology, as the Houston Astros demonstrated this past season. After Sports Illustrated reported an aggressive outburst by Astros assistant general manager Brandon Taubman directed at female reporters, the baseball team quickly critiqued the story. Taubman’s accompanying apology: “I used inappropriate language for which I am deeply sorry and embarrassed” was watered down with the “I’m sorry if anyone was offended” qualifier that marks a classic non-apology apology. It closed by also challenging the article.

After a few days of unsuccessful damage control, only a full retraction and apology from Astros owner Jim Crane could finally quell the controversy: “On behalf of the Astros organization, I want to personally apologize for the statement we issued on Monday, October 21st. We were wrong and I am sorry that we initially questioned your professionalism. We retract that statement, and I assure you that the Houston Astros will learn from this experience.”

If there’s one takeaway from 2019 for the public relations profession, it may be that our overly communicative modern society must constantly be fed facts and truth in telling our stories in good times, or bad. Especially after a mistake, or in the throes of crisis, an apology delayed or denied in the court of public opinion only feeds negative reactions to those non-messages that can take the form of outrage and activism.

“Sorry” can be the hardest word for too many organizations drowning in a crisis, especially when it’s compounded by mishandling timely messaging necessary to navigate through those choppy waters. That makes our informed counsel more important than ever.

Apologize—or not—at your own risk.

PR brief

Sloane works New York Life-Cigna Deal

Sloane & Co. is working as PR firm for New York Life as it agrees to acquire Cigna’s group life and disability insurance business for $6.3 billion. Cigna expects to realize approximately $5.3 billion of net after-tax proceeds from the transaction, which it intends to use for share repurchase and repayment of debt in 2020. Its group life and disability insurance business will now operate within New York Life’s portfolio of strategic businesses.

Working for Sloane on the deal were Managing Director Dan Zacchei; Senior Vice Presidents Joe Germani, Ariel Kouvarams and Lauren Nussbaum; and Senior Associate Sarah Braunstein.

The acquisition is expected to close in the third quarter of 2020, subject to applicable regulatory approvals and other customary closing conditions. Credit Suisse Group served as investment counsel on the deal and Debevoise & Plimpton LLP was outside counsel.

The real cost of crisis

In a crisis, long-term reputation matters a lot more than short-term stock price.

By Tony Langham

On the day the crisis becomes public, the C-suite naturally focus on their company’s stock price, but it’s worth remembering the words of Warren Buffett, who once wrote to his managers that, “We can afford to lose money—even a lot of money. But we can’t afford to lose reputation—even a shred of reputation.” Everything an organization does and says during a crisis matters, but what matters most is long-term credibility, integrity and reputation.

Very few people know the decision-making process Boeing went through in late 2018 and early 2019. After the first 737 Max crash in Indonesia, we do know that the U.S. Federal Aviation Administration allowed the planes to continue to fly, despite misgivings over its stall prevention software. We also know that Boeing made a grave error in continuing to fly the Max 737s until the crash had been fully investigated and that the second crash, in Indonesia in March 2019, should have been avoided. At House committee hearings in December 2019, a former Boeing employee alleged that Boeing had “prioritized production speed over quality and safety.” Boeing’s reputation will probably recover, unless another serious incident happens, because of the long history and high standing of the organization. But recovery will be slower than if it had put reputation ahead of everything else in the days after the first crash was reported.

Reputation accounts for 35 percent of the market value of the world’s leading publicly listed companies according to Reputation Dividend and company boards should bear this in mind at all times. Organizations with the best reputations outperform rivals in tangible ways from recruiting higher quality staff, charging more for their services, succeeding with smaller marketing budgets to exerting greater influence over governments. They’re also the most likely to be given the benefit of doubt in crisis situations.

In the most acute crises—BP and Deepwater Horizon (2010-12); Samsung and exploding phones (2016); Volkswagen and emissions (2014-18) and Boeing (2018-19)—the acute threat to the business and the stock price did not come directly from shareholders and the financial community, but from governments, pressure groups, media, and public concern and outrage. The best crisis managers are therefore those who understand reputation and civil society, rather than those who specialize in understanding stock price movements and the financial community.

To successfully handle a crisis, corporate communications and public relations professionals need to add value to their organization or client in two areas: A real understanding of reputation and genuine reputation management advice.

My favorite definition of reputation comes from John Doorley, formerly of Merck and now Visiting Professor at Elon University in North Carolina, who co-authored the excellent Reputation Management with Helio Fred Garcia. His formula is wonderfully straightforward, it states that reputation is the sum of the images of others—Emenies’ version is pretty good too: “I am whatever you say I am”—and it comes from performance plus behavior plus communication. He says that reputation can only be sustained if an organization is authentic and true to its purpose or to a set of values. This says it all, but it emphasizes how all-encompassing reputation is.

So, anyone who defines their role as narrowly as a public relations or corporate communications professional can only, by definition, be tangentially involved in reputation management—because they’re not at the center of how their organization behaves or performs, only in how it engages and communicates. Stephen Covey memorably said that, “you can’t talk your way out of a problem that you behaved yourself into”—and in times of crisis, organizations almost always need to change their behavior.

In the Boeing case, the crucial commercial decision of whether to keep flying or ground all 737 Maxs until the first crash was beneficial to the share price, but the second crash leaves the share price in a perilous state. In the House transportation hearing on 10 December 2019, the FAA’s Administrator, Stephen Dickson, said the agency should have grounded the Max after the first deadly crash, in October 2018. That’s probably true. I’d argue that Boeing would’ve made that decision itself if it had put long-term reputation ahead of short-term stock price. And that’s a lesson for all of us.

Few execs get PR results they expect

By Jon Gingerich

Corporate executives appear to experience a major disconnect between the results they expect from PR and what they actually get, according to a new survey by North 6th Agency.

According to the survey, a majority of the executives polled (33 percent) claimed that PR was of the utmost importance to their specific business outcomes. However, relatively few (only 10 percent) said PR has actually been highly effective in driving those desired outcomes. On a one-to-five rating scale, a majority of executives (27 percent) rated PR’s effectiveness on their desired business outcomes at only a two.

Moreover, only 30 percent of executives believe that their PR teams have been made fully aware of key performance indicators related to PR.

When it comes to what specific business objectives are wanted out of a PR campaign, most executives seemed to have pretty clear ideas about the goals they have in mind. A vast majority (82 percent) cited raising brand awareness, while 70 percent cited driving revenue. A third (33 percent) said recruiting talent is their top goal, while about a quarter (24 percent) said raising capital is their primary objective. Only 12 percent said they turn to PR to prepare for an IPO.

M&A deal essentials

What information selling agencies should be prepared to provide in the early stages of an acquisition discussion with a potential buying agency.

By Rich Jachetti

While the specifics of PR agency acquisitions vary considerably from one situation to another, there’s one constant that’s true of all potential PR agency M&A deals. If the chemistry feels right after an initial phone call or meeting between the two parties, buyers invariably want to get down to business. Before taking the next step with the seller, however, most buyers will insist on having an opportunity to review highly confidential financial and other operational and management practices information about the seller prospect’s firm to determine if the chemistry, culture and fit with the seller is in the best interest of both parties, and what the terms of a deal could look like.

In our case, when buyers ask us for confidential information about a seller client, we already have most of the information at our fingertips in anticipation of the inevitable query, and after the requisite NDA is signed, we send the information along to the buyer. That’s part of the service we provide. However, there are times when a buyer wants more information than is reasonable for the seller to provide quickly. For example, if the buyer is asking for financial projections for a year not yet concluded, or for a list of companies in the seller’s new business pipeline that may look promising on paper but is actually only speculative and at best a work in progress. Understandably, sellers often aren’t comfortable providing buyers with speculative information, and for sound business reasons are reluctant to make claims about their firm’s anticipated future financial performance or to make any definitive claims about new business opportunities that may—or may not—come to pass as predicted by the seller at year’s end.

There are also instances when a buyer makes what the seller feels are unreasonable demands on him/her to provide the buyer with a mountain of confidential information about their firm in the very early stages of discussion, when the parties are still getting to know each other better. It’s in situations like these when clients depend on their M&A advisor to facilitate the delicate shuttle diplomacy needed to arrive at an acceptable happy medium that doesn’t place too great a burden on the seller to provide the buyer with information they’re still uncomfortable sharing, and yet still respect the buyer’s need for adequate background on the seller’s firm so the buyer is able to get a reasonably solid handle on the general health and well-being of the seller’s business.

Conversely, there are times when the seller isn’t as fully prepared as she/he should be to sufficiently help their M&A advisor take their agency to market, or when it takes us longer than we would prefer to extract the requisite information we need from the seller before we can begin our outreach to buyers. This is, after all, why the CEO of the seller agency engaged The Stevens Group, or another PR agency M&A firm, in the first place. Getting the information we need from sellers can, at times, require an endless thread of emails between us and our client, plus multiple conference calls, the burning up of many dozens of mobile device minutes, plus the gentle nudging, the subtle pleading and threatening—use of “threatening” here is for dramatic emphasis only—between us and our client to finally pry loose the documents every buyer eventually will insist on seeing.

Herewith, therefore, for any sellers-to-be out there, is a brief description of what in most instances every buyer will ask to see from a seller in the early stages of discussion in order to get a potential acquisition opportunity off the ground and moving in the right direction:

Must-have information list for sellers (in no particular order)

- The firm’s P&Ls for at least the previous two years; and the revenue run rate for the current year (Note: buyers want to see P&Ls on an accrual, not cash, basis.).
- Revenue and EBITDA projection for the following year.
- The firm’s balance sheet.
- Past two years of agency revenue for each client with client names.
- Agency revenue broken down by service provided (i.e., revenue derived from earned media, digital media services, creative, consulting, special events, etc.).
- A breakdown of revenues generated via retainer vs. project business.
- Agency organization chart with a list of employees with titles and salaries for the entire FT staff and that includes same for owner(s) of the agency.
- Average number of new business pitch(es) firm does each year; and the firm’s new business win/loss record.
- Account retention and attrition over past three years with names of clients won and lost in that period.
- List of any clients that account for 20 percent or more of agency fee income.
- Length of time of the firm’s premises lease and date when the lease expires.
- A sample case study that demonstrates breadth and depth of firm’s services, capabilities and core strengths.
- Copy of typical client engagement letter.
- Example of typical new business proposal.
- Bios of CEO and key staff.

One last word of advice for PR agency CEOs who want to sell their firm. We at The Stevens Group suggest that the moment an agency CEO begins thinking about the possibility of selling his or her firm, that this is also the moment for the CEO to begin the process of gathering the information listed above. When the time is right, you want to be fully prepared to begin discussions with buyer prospects. And remember, a buyer’s first impression of a seller firm is often formed by how buttoned-up the seller firm is from day one of your first interaction with a buyer prospect. What’s more, when you’re ready to set the wheels in motion to sell your firm, you’ll already have a solid head start on what is often going to be a long, protracted process of finding the right buyer for your business. Rich Jachetti is a Senior Partner at The Stevens Group.

Sard Verbinnen directs Xperi/TiVo merger

Sard Verbinnen & Co. is handling the $3 billion merger of Xperi, audio, technology products company, with TiVo, video entertainment outfit.

The companies say the deal creates an entertainment technology powerhouse and an industry-leading intellectual property licensing platform with more than 10,000 patents and applications.

The merged company will take on the Xperi corporate name with TiVo as an entertainment brand. Xperi shareholders will own 46.5 percent, while TiVo while stockholders will own the balance.

With the deal, TiVo has shelved its plan to separate its product and IP business. That was supposed to happen in April 2020.

The Xperi/TiVo merger is expected to close during the second-quarter of this year.

Sard Verbinnen’s John Christiansen, Megan Bouchier and Alyssa Lorenzo are working the merger deal.

Winning crisis strategies with Gen Z

How brands can implement key learnings from Generation Z in their digital crisis communications efforts.

By Lindsey Carnett

Crisis communications is an integral part of a brand's survival. And in an age where social media can make or break a brand's reputation, an effective crisis communications plan should be in place for all brands, forming an essential part of their communications strategy to protect image, meet industry regulations and conform to best practice.

Gen Z are perhaps the most influential and most targeted stakeholder group. 60 million Gen Z individuals are in the United States, outnumbering Millennials by a million. It's estimated that by 2020, Generation Z will account for 40 percent of all consumers.

They're always switched on: they use multiple devices, prefer video and voice messages over “traditional” text and email and are quick to respond in a digitally-public way to voice their approval and disapproval. This makes them a potential risk for brands if they want to publicly identify problems that they have experienced. Social media has changed the game, and particularly with Gen Z, as the most digitally native stakeholder group. Therefore, it’s particularly important for brands to effectively and positively engage with them.

Gen Z individuals value relationships based on trust and demand transparency from their brands. It’s a brand’s responsibility to grow and nurture these relationships, and those that do this well have strong relationships that are typically less affected by crisis situations.

An effective crisis communications plan should be in place for all brands and be able to be implemented immediately. This gives a brand the chance to be proactive, with the ability to control the narrative, deal with criticism and issue a robust response. In the age of digital media, this has never been more important.

While they can sometimes be part of the problem, it’s sensible for brands to work with this influential consumer group to increase their reach and profits as well as consult rapidly when crisis communications work is required.

How can brands win at crisis communications with Gen Z?

Have them help you be human. Be open, authentic and honest. Gen Zers can help brands with this. For brands to truly target and work with their target audience, involve an influencer within the drafting and creation of your response. They can help you come out from behind the screen, speaking the language and shaping the narrative that can win back trust and keep consumers on side.

Capitalize and work with them on user generated content. Brands that work with stakeholders to create user generated content can use this technique to build—or re-build—trust post a crisis communications incident. Authentic content will appeal to stakeholders, particularly Gen Z individuals who enjoy and respond positively to updates that are genuine.

Video content. Gen Zers are in a hurry, consuming content on more than one device. Prioritizing video content is a strong strategy for brands in a crisis communications situation, and brands should focus on creating short, one-to-three-minute videos that get straight to the point, have a strong headline and provide information that consumers will find useful. It’s important to also include captions in the video for users who watch in their social media feeds, without the sound on.

Encourage sharing. For a response to a crisis to go viral—in the right way—it’s important that response is easily shareable. Brands should add sharing functionality and encourage supporters to share across their respective networks. Brands should also use their internal communications strategy to encourage employees to share the response.

New ways to shape and distribute responses. Effective crisis communications must be proactive to get ahead of the story and to shape the narrative. Responding to the story using social media techniques like live streamed statements and videos ensures that a response is put in front of the right audience at the right time. Additionally, using platforms for targeting can help brands get in front of the appropriate stakeholders and get ahead of the narrative.

True to values and beliefs. Gen Z individuals value real people, not celebrities. Authenticity is key and with FTC guidelines ensuring that bloggers and social creators must prominently display if and when they are creating paid content for brands. This provides Gen Z individuals—and other stakeholders—with honesty up front, helping to generate trust from the outset.

Gen Zers value personal connections and, as adult consumers, they’ll likely demand more transparency from the brands they buy and the companies that produce and sell them. This helps brands to generate genuine, stronger relationships with their customers.

For brands, it’s also important that they ensure their public facing image supports the corporate culture of their company. For them to not do so runs the risk of charges of hypocrisy, a decrease in trust and ultimately, loss of business.

To avoid a communications disaster played out in front of the world’s digital media, having a robust and proactive crisis communications plan in place is an essential tool for all brands. And working with the influential Gen Z to shape and drive forward is an effective approach for brand survival.

PR brief

Content becomes top focus for 2020

Content will remain a central priority for PR pros in 2020, with information overload and communicators’ ability to cut through the noise emerging as major challenges within the industry, according to a recent survey of chief marketing officers by PAN Communications.

PAN’s “CMO Predictions” campaign asked industry experts to share their predictions, concerns, priorities and challenges for the coming year. As it turns out, content marketing and data emerged as two recurring themes this time: nearly two-thirds of respondents (63 percent) cited content as either a budget focus, a critical skillset within their marketing departments or an upcoming challenge for the work they do.

Altogether, nearly 70 percent of respondents mentioned data or analytics in their predictions for 2020, underscoring the important role data now plays in evaluating marketing efforts and customer experiences in an effort to improve content marketing strategies.

Other priorities among CMOs for the coming year included employee and customer advocacy, as well as implementing advocacy programs in ways that will bring new levels of trust and awareness among consumers.

PAN’s third annual “CMO Predictions” campaign gathered insights from more than 20 leading CMOs and marketing influencers via email outreach.

WHEN EVERYTHING IS ON THE LINE
WHO DO YOU WANT REPRESENTING YOU?

“The crew from the television magazine is banging on your door. You can have the security guard throw them out and know they’ll trash you. Or you can sit down with them and figure that out of the hour you give them, they’ll use only 40 seconds on air. And those 40 seconds will make you look very guilty. Better solution, call Mike Sitrick.” – Forbes Magazine

“The Winston Wolf of public relations had arrived. Wolf, you will recall, was the fixer in Pulp Fiction. Played by Harvey Keitel, he washed away assassins’ splatter and gore. Sitrick cleans up the messes of companies, celebrities and others, and he’s a strategist who isn’t averse to treating PR as combat.”—Fortune Magazine

“Now (they) have hired Michael Sitrick, whose Los Angeles (based) public relations firm is known for going atomic on opponents, using “truth squads,” “wheel-of-pain” tactics and high profile journalists (to write profiles...That’s unbelievable (said the head of the PR firm for the opposing entity). This is the heavy artillery.” – BusinessWeek

TechCrunch: “When it comes to handling crisis situations in particular, Sitrick is as well regarded as they come.” “We’ve been in a tricky position a number of times and the thinking (in Silicon Valley) has historically been to ignore reporters, says one Bay Area tech founder. “Sitrick takes the opposite approach. The importance of post-crisis communications

When a crisis appears resolved, it’s time to work on an aftermath recovery plan for the sake of restoring and improving the company’s long-term reputation.

By Jill Allread

Rarely is a crisis expected, but how well a business responds to the unexpected will reflect either poorly or positively on future public perception of—and confidence in—the organization. One determining factor is whether or not business leadership proactively uses post-crisis communications.

Everything’s at risk of disruption when an organization is navigating a crisis. From the Board Chairman to the CEO and senior leaders to front-line employees, everyone’s attention is distracted during a crisis. If leadership is savvy, legal advisors and crisis communication counselors are employed to provide needed support. By the time a crisis appears resolved, team members are exhausted from the pressures of navigating the high-stakes issue. They’re anxious to put the crisis behind them and return to normal. Their budgets are tight because of the unexpected expenses of the crisis. But this is exactly the time more work is needed to restore and strengthen an organization’s reputation and relationship with its publics.

It doesn’t matter what created the crisis: labor issues, lawsuits, cyber breaches, personnel issues such as #MeToo allegations, attack campaigns, shootings, accidents or natural disasters. Too often businesses underestimate how long residual threats last in the aftermath. Questions like: “To what degree did the crisis influence public perception of our brand? How do we regain public confidence after this crisis? Does our reputation need to be repaired or completely rebuilt?” must be addressed. Strategic communications can reach audiences to proactively answer questions and concerns and earn respect for doing the right thing.

One recent example of doing the right thing in crisis response and post-crisis recovery happened when a management team in the Midwest suffered a heartbreaking accident. The holiday-shift staff on the grounds of a popular wildlife safari park discovered a fire in one of the park’s animal barns shortly after 6:20 p.m. on Thanksgiving, when the property lost power.

Flames from the weather-related electrical fire engulfed the barn so quickly that ten animals inside—including three giraffes—perished. The team’s quick action saved several zebras housed in outdoor enclosures and, as a precaution, the team released into secure fields two other giraffes in a nearby barn that was also in danger of burning if the fire spread. One of the giraffes was photographed by a person passing by the park. The image of the fleeing giraffe in silhouette against a background of flames was widely used in national and regional news outlets. While those giraffes survived, the wildlife park staff were devastated by the loss of animals they cared for every day. They felt like they lost family members.

Notified about the fire, park owners called on Public Communications Inc. crisis counselors to provide immediate support, including crisis communication strategies to gather and share accurate and timely information as well as provide messaging for media interviews Thanksgiving night, a news release and media statements and social media content and strategy.

Because animal-related stories generate strong public interest, news of the fire began trending on social media and regional news outlet channels within minutes. People expressed concern for the staff and sadness over the loss of the animals, particularly the charismatic giraffes. Some made comments critical of the park for having animals saved. By the following Wednesday, fire officials determined the fire was accidental and announced the case closed; however, post-crisis communication strategies continued, driven by the goal to build strong public confidence in the wildlife park’s response to the disaster.

Strategies included providing behind-the-scenes updates on happenings at the park that was then closed for the season. These included:

- Insights into the grief counseling provided to staff saddened by the loss.
- Examples and stories of the extraordinary care of the park’s 400 animals.
- Updates on the wellbeing of the giraffe photographed the night of the blaze. Much to the relief of their fans, the park featured the rescued giraffe on its Facebook page happily receiving special snacks from his keepers.
- Plans to honor the memory of the animals lost in the fire.

Post-crisis communications helped anticipate and address questions and the public’s interest in the welfare of the animals. For example, with offers of support from people across the country, the park announced it would send all donations to an international giraffe conservation nonprofit organization working to save giraffes in Africa. Proactive communication continued to help strengthen the park’s relationship with its members, partners, social media fans and staff. The crisis-recovery plan continues being implemented with strategies for next season’s re-opening and animal stories that foster the public’s love and care for wildlife.

Here’s a quick checklist to help guide post-crisis recovery that can have a positive effect on an organization’s long reputation:

- Conduct a crisis post-mortem debrief and analysis. Include detailed analysis of the organization’s social media engagement and sentiment.
- Follow through on any promises made to the public, employees, other stakeholders and pros. Proactively communicate those actions and follow up.
- Communicate to rebuild any damaged relationships. Identify all key audiences who should know about progress being made, including customers or members, employees, shareholders and, if needed, regulatory or accrediting agencies. If nonprofit, then donors, too.
- Build confidence in leadership. A crisis can be an opportunity to showcase inspired leadership to renew an organization. A leader of good character who’s truly committed to the values of an organization can step forward with optimism to rebuild the organization to be even better than it was before the crisis.

By understanding the complexity of a crisis and employing effective post-crisis communication strategies, an organization will not only survive, it will thrive.

Jill Allread, APR, is CEO of Public Communications Inc., a national independent PR and digital agency headquartered in Chicago.
No. 17 in O'Dwyer’s 2018 healthcare rankings with fees of $5 million.

Launched in 1997, SPI provides internal communications services to clients such as Bayer, Novo Nordisk, Merck, Regeneron, Pfizer and Novartis.

RF ranked as O’Dwyer’s No. 7 independent PR firm, registering overall fees of $69.1 million during the past year.

Next Fifteen Acquires Health Unlimited USA. Next Fifteen Communications Group has acquired the U.S. division of Health Unlimited.

Health Unlimited, along with its specialist consultancy Corkery Group, will be rebranded as M Booth Health and operate as a separate agency reporting to M Booth CEO Dale Bornstein. M Booth was acquired by Next Fifteen in 2009.

Timothy Bird, Health Unlimited Global CEO, and his US-based management team will continue to lead the agency.

Health Unlimited comes in at #5 on O’Dwyer’s list of top healthcare firms, reporting 2018 net fees of $24.3 million. For the year ending March 31, the agency reported adjusted before-tax profit of $5.2 million and net assets of $17 million. It is to be acquired debt-free.

Ex-MWWPR, Catalyst PR exec charged with wire fraud. Former PR executive Andrew Garson was arrested and charged with wire fraud in connection with multi-million-dollar schemes to defraud two PR firms where he worked and for a subsequent scheme to obtain New York State unemployment benefits to which he was not entitled, according to a suit filed by Geoffrey Ueman, U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York.

The suit does not name the firms that employed Garson, but the allegations cover the period from 2013 to 2018 when he worked as Executive VP at MWWPR and VP at Catalyst PR, a unit of WME|IMG (now known as Endeavor).

“Behind the scenes, Garson allegedly schemed to steal from his employers, eventually costing them over $2 million in losses.” Berman said in a release.

Garson is charged with two counts of wire fraud, each of which carries a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison.

Huawei makes $1 million pivot to BCW arm. Huawei Technologies USA has retained BCW's Pivot Integrated Communications arm for a one-year strategic communications program in the US pegged at $939,179 in fees.

In its federal filing, Pivot says Huawei Technologies USA is wholly owned by Huawei Technologies Co. Ltd., which is located in Shenzhen, China.

“It is our understanding that Huawei Technologies Co. Ltd., which owns Huawei Technologies USA Inc. is a private, employee-owned company,” according to Pivot's federal filing.

Shep Smith quits Fox News. Shepard Smith, Fox news anchor and Managing Editor of the network’s breaking news unit, quit Oct. 11. He broke the news during his program. Smith is a sometimes critic of President Trump.

The anchor of the afternoon “Shepard Smith Reporting” program said the decision to walk was his own.

Publicis eliminates MSL CEO post. Guillaume Herbette, Global CEO of MSL, is leaving the firm as Publicis Groupe CEO Arthur Sadoun has decided to eliminate the position.

“We will not appoint a new global head of MSL,” wrote Sadoun in a note to staffers. “With the implementation of the country model, all MSL offices in the world will now report to the new country structure of Publicis Group.”

Platinum Equity shells out $2.7 billion for Cision. Platinum Equity, which has $19 billion in assets under management, is acquiring Cision for $2.7 billion in cash.

The $10-per share offer is a 34 percent premium over the 60-day closing stock price for the period ended Oct. 21.

The PR services firm posted a $7.7 million loss on $190.4 million in second-quarter revenues. Its stock has traded in the $6.02 to $15.76 range during the past 52 weeks.

PRSA puts search for CEO “on hold.” Public Relations Society of America put the search for the CEO “on hold” until early this year when more people are looking for jobs. Russell Reynolds was doing the search.

Joe Truncale stepped down as CEO on July 15, taking on the role of consultant. PRSA CFO Phil Bonaventura took over Truncale’s CEO duties on an interim basis.

Garland Stansell, chair-elect, told the Assembly in San Diego that the search for Truncale’s replacement was being pushed back into 2020 after the holiday season.

Teneo’s Sayegh to return to Team Trump. Tony Sayegh, Spokesperson for Treasury Secretary Steve Mnuchin, who joined Teneo last month as Managing Director, is returning to the Trump administration to handle communications surrounding impeachment.

He will be responsible for communications strategy, messaging and recruit surrogates to support the President.

Pam Bondi, former Florida Attorney General who joined the Sunshine State’s Ballard Partners last January; is teaming with Sayegh on impeachment communications.

Abernathy MacGregor’s Jim Abernathy dies at 78. Jim Abernathy, Founder/Executive Chairman of Abernathy MacGregor, died Nov. 17. He was 78.

The Kansas City native launched Abernathy MacGregor in 1984 with Jim MacGregor. The shop, which currently has more than 70 staffers in New York, Washington, Houston, Los Angeles and San Francisco, became part of Havas in 2000.

Prior to AM, Abernathy edited broadcasting trade magazines and held PR/IR posts at ABC, CBS and Warner Communications.

Finn Partners beefs up healthcare unit. Finn Partners has acquired Medical & Health Consulting, Paris-headquartered firm that works for biopharma, technology and medical devices outfits.

Marie-Helene Coste, MHC Founding Director, will take on the role of Senior Director, Health for Finn Europe. She will report to Chantal Bowman-Boyles, Managing Partner of Europe and Gil Bashe, Managing Partner of global health.

Peter Finn called MHC a “perfect complement” to his firm’s September acquisition of high-science healthcare firm Lazar Partners, a 22-member New York firm.

CLS parachutes into Bolivia’s political mess. CLS Strategies has picked up a 90-day assignment to provide strategic counsel to the government of Bolivia, which has been rocked by political upheaval.

Former President Evo Morales, who ruled the country for 14 years, has been granted refugee status in Argentina.

He fled to Mexico following a contested election in October after his government was charged with manipulating the results.

Bolivia’s interim president Jeanine Anez issued an arrest warrant for Morales, charging him with treason.

Interpublic junks Golin’s Co-CEO trio model. Interpublic has junked Golin’s three co-CEO model that it put into effect Jan. 2017 with the exit of chief Fred Cook. Matt Neale assumes CEO slot.

Under the “CEO+” structure, Neale handled thought leadership, reputation, new products; Gary Rudnick managed North America, finance, HR; and Jon Hughes supervised international activities.

Rudnick now slides into the President and COO position, reporting to Neale. Neale reports to Andy Polansky, CEO of IPG’s Constituency Management Group.
Avoid the ‘call center’ approach to crisis

By Alex Stanton

Organizations responding to a crisis too often end up employing an approach like what many of us have experienced when interacting with a customer call center on a problem or complaint. You get a morass of contradictory information from someone who lacks authority, a refusal to accept responsibility and no feasible solution to your problem.

The reason this strategy underperforms in a call center interaction is the same reason it falls short in a crisis situation: the focus is on rapid, uniform response, not on providing what’s necessary: thoughtful, nuanced responses tailored to the needs and motivations of specific audiences. As much as people want immediate answers in the wake of a crisis, they understand that the world is a complicated place and not everything is black or white. What they want most is to be heard and treated with respect, to get a response that’s honest and authentic. And sometimes people just want to hear the facts so they can judge for themselves.

In today’s fast-paced, judgmental media environment, gaining this trust requires an authentic transparency tailored to key audiences. It’s no secret that achieving this amidst a crisis can be quite difficult. But, there are some things communicators can think through and put in place early in 2020 to ensure their organization is ready in the event the unexpected happens.

Agreement on your message and tone

It’s simply not possible to communicate with authenticity and nuance in crisis situations if your brand message and tonality isn’t concrete. It’s not just what you say but how you say it that makes a real difference. A good many crisis communications blunders are directly related to conflicts between factions of a company that rear their head at the precise time when you need teamwork to operate effectively—and message and tone are often the battleground.

Organizations always think they have this nailed down. But once you apply the pressure that naturally comes in the crisis arena, cracks begin to show very quickly. Unfortunately, the list of companies that fall victim to this at some point or another is long, and the damage tends to be lasting. Worst of all, it’s totally preventable. Take time now to stress test those messages with your key constituents.

Dynamic spokespeople can handle nuance

Dynamic spokespeople don’t just parrot talking points. They know how to tie any question back to a key message and do so in a thoughtful, empathetic way. Just think how different your call center experiences are when the representative is armed to be thoughtful and articulate in responding to the nuance of your situation. The same is true in crisis communications. You can arm a spokesperson with a list of talking points, but that doesn’t mean they’re going to perform at a high level under the scrutiny of today’s whirlwind media environment.

The problem organizations face is that the only way to develop dynamic spokespeople is to log many hours of practice (and if you don’t believe me, put a camera in front of your primary spokesperson and quiz them hard on some uncomfortable topics for 10-15 minutes). After watching the results, consider that the average interview with a print journalist is 20-30 minutes.

Most spokespeople say they’re too busy doing their day job to take the time to do the needed preparation. But if you wait until the crisis, it’s too late. Without dynamic, prepared spokespeople, you can have the best response in the world and still fail to connect your messages with the proper audience. Reporters tend to have a knack for getting otherwise articulate spokespeople to trip up. Only diligent practice can lessen that risk.

Find authentic transparency

It’s vital that you communicate authentically with your key audiences even when you don’t have complete information. In crisis situations, you usually possess only 60 percent of the information you’d like to have before you need to respond to media and other audiences who are growing impatient (and sometimes reporting inaccurately). The rest takes time to gather, and information often changes as the situation evolves.

This lack of complete information can cause organizations to be reluctant to prioritize transparency. That’s a mistake. In fact, incomplete information makes transparency even more critical, not less. Declining to comment or appearing to be hiding something diminishes any chance of an authentic response that builds and maintains your credibility.

In the initial stages of a crisis, being as upfront about the reality of the situation as you can within the confines of prudence is always good policy. It tells decision-makers and influencers that even though you may not have all the answers, you respect them enough to offer up what is known now. And that will often buy you the time and credibility needed to gather further information, tighten your responses and navigate the situation effectively.

Consumers worried about digital media’s health effects

By Jon Gingerich

A growing number of North American consumers are beginning to think about what potential negative effects their daily use of electronic devices is having on their lives, according to a consumer survey commissioned by Two Sides.

The survey found that nearly half of respondents (48 percent) believe they spend too much time on electronic devices. More than half of those polled (53 percent) are now concerned that their personal overuse of electronic devices could be damaging to their health.

However, less than a third of the Two Sides survey respondents (29 percent) said they currently feel they’re suffering from “digital overload” (31 percent of U.S. respondents and 27 percent of Canadians).

That said, an overwhelming majority (70 percent) said they value the importance of “switching off” and reading more in print.

The Two Sides survey found that a majority of Americans still prefer print over digital when it comes to reading everything from books (68 percent) and magazines (65 percent) to newspapers (53 percent).

Only respondents between the ages of 18 and 24 widely prefer digital when it comes to reading newspapers (62 percent) and magazines (53 percent), but still, even a majority of that generation prefers print when it comes to reading books (54 percent).
Coca-Cola calls Arroyo CMO

Manuel “Manolo” Arroyo, Group President of the Coca-Cola Company’s Asia Pacific region, has been promoted to the position of Global Chief Marketing Officer. Arroyo officially assumed the top marketing role on January 1.

Arroyo was named Group President of Coca-Cola's Asia Pacific group in 2018. He previously led the company’s Mexico business. Prior to that, he was President of Coca-Cola’s South East and West Asia business unit and also served as General Manager of Coca-Cola Iberia franchise unit.

Arroyo started his Coca-Cola career in 1995 in Madrid and went on to become Global Brand Manager for its Bottled Water & Fresca/Quatro brands in Atlanta three years later.

With Arroyo’s promotion, the soft drink giant has now reinstated the global CMO role more than two years after nixing the title in early 2017. Coca-Cola’s global marketing duties had previously been handled by Chief Growth Officer Francisco Crespo, who announced his retirement in December after a three-decade career with the company.

Arroyo will continue to serve as President of Coca-Cola’s Asia Pacific group.

Former ABC comms. exec lands at Warner-Media

Jori Arancio, who left Disney-ABC in October after 21 years with the company, has been named Executive Vice President of Communications at Warner-Media’s HBO Max, TNT, TBS and TruTV units.

At Disney, Arancio was most recently Senior VP of Communications for ABC Entertainment and ABC Studios, overseeing strategic corporate communication efforts, consumer press campaigns, awards outreach and talent relations.

She had previously served as Communications VP at the company’s Freeform streaming service, VP of Communications at ABC Daytime and SOAPnet, and Communications Manager of the Disney Channel.

Arancio will report to EVP, Global Communications, WarnerMedia Entertainment and Direct-To-Consumer Kevin Brockman. Arancio previously worked with Brockman at Disney.

Hotwire calls Kernahan North American CEO

Heather Kernahan, President of Hotwire North America and Australia, has been has been promoted to the role of North America Chief Executive Officer at the global tech PR agency.

Kernahan joined the U.S. and UK-based tech PR specialist in 2016. She was previously President of tech firm Eastwick Communications, which was acquired by Hotwire in 2016. Kernahan has led Hotwire’s North American and Australian operations ever since.

Prior to that, Kernahan was Global Marketing Director at energy technology company Enphase Energy. Earlier in her career, she worked at CA-based software/services company Autodesk, where she held a variety of titles before ultimately being named Senior Marketing Manager of Product and Industry Marketing.

Kernahan reports to Group CEO Barbara Bates, who will continue to oversee Hotwire’s global leadership team.

FTI powers up energy/natural resources unit

FTI Consulting has added Shannon Maher Bañana as a Managing Director in the strategic communications unit’s Energy & Resources Operation.

Based in Washington, the environmental and energy policy pro will focus on PA and issues management as the power and utilities sector undergoes rapid change due to technology developments, increased regulatory oversight and shifting consumer preferences.

Bañana joins the publicly traded company from TECO Energy, where she served as Director of Federal Affairs for the past five years. Earlier, she worked as Senior Manager of Public Policy & Governmental Affairs at Public Service Enterprise Group.

Bañana has federal government experience gained as an enforcement attorney at the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and Dept. of Energy, where she handled environmental and nuclear matters.

Bristol-Myers Squibb hires CVS’ Metcalfe

Bristol-Myers Squibb has named healthcare PR veteran Kathryn Metcalfe Executive VP, Corporate Affairs, effective Jan. 6.

Metcalfe goes to BMS from CVS Health, where she was Chief Communications Officer. She previously served as CCO at both Aetna and Deloitte, held VP posts at Pfizer and Novartis and helmed Cohn & Wolfe’s New York office.

Metcalfe’s appointment follows the announcement that BMS Executive VP, Corporate Affairs & Investor Relations John Elicker will be retiring on March 31.

Tim Power, who is currently lead for IR, will take on the position of VP & IR Chief upon Elicker’s retirement.

Gaerlan takes PR post at Travel Leaders

Elizabeth Gaerlan, who has more than 20 years of PR, corporate communications and event management experience, has joined Travel Leaders Group as VP, PR and Communications.

She’s held Senior VP slots at Weber Shandwick’s travel & lifestyle practice and travel specialist M. Silver Assocs, which was acquired by Finn Partners.

Gaerlin, who most recently was running her own firm, also worked as a consultant for American Airlines and Communications Director for Toys ‘R’ Us.

Travel Leaders Group is one of the nation’s largest travel agencies, managing more than 6,000 leisure, business and franchise locations.

Allison+Partners is a global marketing and communications agency driven by a collaborative approach to innovation and creativity.

We help companies create and maintain reputational value through best practices in corporate and financial communications, public affairs, influencer relations, content marketing and digital strategies with as little negative business impact as possible. From high-visibility litigation, product recalls, labor issues, C-suite changeovers, airline disasters and corporate malfeasance, our experienced team is in your corner when the stakes are high and time is of the essence.

Crisis preparedness and response is an integral part of the overarching reputation continuum. We use a cyclical process that begins prior to an issue escalating and continues well after a crisis has taken place. As part of the reputation continuum, we put as much effort into recovering corporate reputation after the fact and continuing to grow corporate credibility and profile through influencers and leadership opportunities on a daily basis, all the time.

BerlinRosen is an award-winning, full-service strategic communications firm with top-tier legal and crisis communications practice offering high-level strategy, external relations (media, regulators, etc.) and internal/stakeholder management, digital strategy and public affairs services for law firms, corporations and institutions. We are currently ranked #1 on NY Observer’s PR Power 50.

BerlinRosen’s Legal Affairs and Crisis Communications practice provides high-level strategy and communications guidance to law firms, companies, nonprofits and high-net-worth individuals. Recently, we have guided an international consumer technology company through a worldwide recall, handled reputation management for a national nonprofit ensnared in a USDOJ investigation into a sitting governor and advised the Board of Directors of a major media company contending with multiple cases of employee harassment. For law firms, we also provide both proactive, case-specific media strategy and firm- and attorney-profile building. Drawing from the firm’s political and advocacy roots, BerlinRosen brings a unique campaign-style approach to legal and crisis communications, combining seasoned strategists and media professionals with the creativity, agility and speed needed to manage a crisis.

Our Legal Affairs and Crisis Communications practice is led by Jonathan Rosen, Principal and Co-Founder and Andrew Friedman, Senior Vice President. Friedman was Deputy Communications Director to the New York Attorney General and, before that, was an Emmy-award winning broadcast journalist.

Our areas of crisis expertise include:
• Executive-level strategic guidance
• Message development and materials
• Media strategy and media relations
• Media training and interview prep
• Media monitoring and sentiment tracking (social and traditional)

For plaintiffs’ law firms, our expertise includes:
• Case-specific media strategy
• Thought leadership and profile building
• Institutional communications
• Video production (exhibits, etc.)

While unique situations often require unique solutions, our experience underscores that there are best practices that should be applied in a crisis. In regulatory actions, investigations, ethics violations, accounting issues, cybersecurity issues, product recalls, or other unexpected crises, we work with our clients during all phases of communications planning and response to implement both the “unique” and the “best.” In a crisis, a company is judged not only on the crisis itself, but also by how it prepared, managed and communicated during the event.

We help our clients control the dialogue and establish context for their actions going forward.

Bringing calm and strategy to clients in crisis, Public Communications Inc. works closely with our clients to prepare them to effectively handle situations that can threaten an organization’s brand and erode consumer confidence. We partner with clients from prevention through the challenges of managing issues to then thriving in post-crisis recovery.

PCI’s experienced counselors consistently delivers award-winning campaigns for clients with reputation management and enhancement needs in all fields, including healthcare companies and associations; conservation, zoo and aquarium organizations; government agencies and nonprofits of all sizes. When an organization faces trouble, a thorough and strategic crisis communications plan is vital. We work with clients to identify, plan for, and mitigate crises that have the potential to negatively shape public opinion and disrupt business.

The PCI team has extensive experience helping clients manage their reputational risk through crisis communications planning and implementation. We also have specialists to provide spokesperson training and coaching on how to best articulate company values and messages that can restore the public faith and support.

PCI offers clients a specialized, post-crisis communication recovery model based on rapid response; ongoing and proactive communication; and inspired thought leadership that is critical to companies of all sizes. In recent years, PCI developed deep experience and skills in assisting clients to communicate effectively through natural and man-made disasters and through personnel and labor issues, including cases of #MeToo allegations and company culture change,
Crisis communications is generally thought of as rapid response when a crisis hits. At Qorvis Communications, we believe that if you wait to handle a crisis until after it hits, you are too late. Based in Washington, our crisis experts come from the world of political campaigns in which crisis is a part of everyday life. Successful political campaigns can handle crisis because they have done opposition research and know their opponents’ vulnerabilities and potential issues as well as their own. Rarely if ever do major multinational corporations undertake a full-scale vulnerability assessment to predict potential future communications challenges. Because of our extensive political experience, we approach crisis with a holistic, methodical and 4-stage plan; PREDICT potential crises ahead of time, PREPARE to deal with them as they arise, PUSH BACK when the time comes, and then PIVOT seamlessly back to your brand positives. We believe the bottom line is: If you do not predict and then prepare for negative issues and crisis, there is little chance of success. To the brand narrative. At Qorvis, crisis-Management Firm.

ReviveHealth, a Weber Shandwick company, is a full-service agency focused on the intersection of healthcare delivery, finance, and innovation. The agency’s work has been recognized as Healthcare Agency of the Year Finalist (The Holmes Report), and the Crisis Communications Agency of the Year (Black Book). Headquartered in Nashville with other offices in Boston, Santa Barbara, and Minneapolis, ReviveHealth’s dedicated issues practice is led by veterans with proven experience in helping high profile healthcare clients overcome controversy, protect the reputation of their brand, and build public support. Through strategies deeply rooted in an understanding of today’s unpredictable and turbulent healthcare environment — and holding a firm grasp of the rapidly changing media and stakeholder environment — we execute programs that advance and protect the reputation of our clients, pro-actively manage risk across their enterprise, and position them for what’s next.

Less important than what you say about yourself is what others say about you.
• Forbes: “The crew from the television magazine is bashing on your door. You can have the security guard throw them out and know they’ll trash you. Or you can sit down with them and figure that out of the hour you give them, they’ll use only 40 seconds on air. And those 40 seconds will make you look very guilty. Better solution, call Mike Sitrick.”
• BusinessWeek: That’s unbelievable. This is the heavy artillery.” Quote is from the CEO of one of the largest PR firms in the world, after learning we were brought in on the other side of a contentious matter in which his firm was involved.

Since our firm’s founding 31 years ago, we have been consistently ranked among the top crisis and strategic communications firms in the nation.

The majority of the firm’s senior executives are former editors and reporters from news organizations that include the Wall Street Journal, the New York Times, Bloomberg, Los Angeles Times, Forbes, CBS News, and NBC.
News. We also have former practicing attorneys and business executives.

Matters with which we have been involved include litigation support of all kinds; intellectual property matters, allegations of corruption, manipulation, wrongful termination, contract disputes, allegations of fraud and fraudulent inducement, wrongful death claims, allegations of illegal drug use, SEC matters, and a variety of other white-collar crimes. We have also handled criminal and civil cases against companies and their executives for such things as price fixing, insurance fraud, options backdating, antitrust violations, race and sex discrimination, sexual harassment, racism and #MeToo matters. We have a significant data breach, mergers and acquisitions and corporate governance practice and have done extensive work combating short sellers. Other issues include sensitive environmental matters, racketeering cases, family disputes, and high-profile divorces, reputation management and reputational positioning. We have also been involved in helping to launch such firms as Oaktree Capital.

Offices are in Los Angeles, San Francisco, New York, Boston and Washington, D.C., though we have handled cases all over the world.

Sloane & Company is an industry-leading strategic communications firm that provides a range of crisis-focused services around situations including: shareholder activism; litigation; unforeseen management changes; Board issues; employee issues; cybersecurity; natural disasters; product integrity; regulatory and legislative issues; bankruptcies / restructurings; environmental issues; and corporate governance. More broadly, we provide strategic counsel and support around corporate and financial public relations; transactions; strategic insights; messaging, analytics and measurement; public affairs; and investor relations — to public and private companies as well as investors, associations and individuals.

We are experts at assisting clients when unforeseen events threaten to impact their business or damage their reputation. We are known for our intelligence, intensity, creativity and focus on getting results. Whether the situation calls for developing and delivering the right messages to the audiences that matter or advising on high-stakes deals or crises, our goal is the same — to drive winning outcomes for our clients.

We have become a go-to firm when these crises and special situations occur by listening to our clients, understanding the situation, determining the risks to their business and delivering candid advice to management teams, boards, executives and organizations when they need it most. Clients have the benefit of working with senior executives with decades of experience who offer professional counsel in all phases of crisis planning and response, leading to immediate results.

Beyond specific crisis situations, we develop effective and actionable contingency plans in close coordination with a client’s legal, financial, marketing, communications and government relations/lobbying advisors. Our approach provides best-practices and enhances client procedures and appropriate training of personnel before and during a crisis. When the unexpected happens, we actively manage and support implementing the appropriate communications tactics. After the crisis subsides, we help clients restore their credibility and reputation in the marketplace.

With offices in Boston and New York, Solomon McCown (SMC) supports clients that face complex, mission-critical issues at the intersection of public policy and business. The firm works within education, healthcare and real estate sectors, and with corporations and non-profit organizations to deliver integrated communications strategies that include: messaging, media relations & training, government relations, digital and social campaigns, and development of creative content that helps clients achieve their goals.

We believe that at the core of advancing an organization’s mission is protecting it. Crisis planning and management is a defining strength of our organization. Our nationally-recognized senior team of crisis managers comes from journalism and politics. We have developed crisis plans for corporations, institutions, and mission-focused organizations, and have played a key role in many sensitive and complex issues including data breaches, public health issues, labor negotiations and strikes, bankruptcies and business failures, accusations of sexual harassment and abuse, Title IX complaints, regulatory investigations, workplace violence and natural disasters. We excel at working with both in-house and outside legal and communications teams to devise strategies that dovetail with the legal strategy.

Exxon wins, truth prevails

By Fraser Seitel

If you, like most of your fellow compatriots, have been consumed lately by the gripping impeachment drama in Washington (yawn), or the scurrilous accusation that the New England Patriots would actually cheat to win (groan), or the news that back-broken Harvey Weinstein has bribed his way out of prison (phew) … then you probably weren’t paying attention a few weeks ago when a significant, long-awaited court case was decided in New York City.

If so, you’re to be forgiven, because the New York Times also buried the court decision—New York State v. Exxon Mobil—even though that paper had engaged in a five-year, front-page crusade to, well, bury the oil company for its alleged role in perpetuating global warming.

In a day marked by “alternative facts” and “false assertions” and “Pinocchio fact checks” and “fake news,” the fact that dreaded Exxon prevailed despite a tidal wave of relentless negative publicity should be welcome news to any communicator who believes in the power of truth over distortion, bullying and hysteria.

In case you missed it, here’s a brief synopsis of the campaign—not-so-subtly engineered by the formally-objective New York Times—to bring Exxon down.

The Times’ anti-Exxon march began in 2015, when it ran a glowing profile—how Exxon lied to the public and investors poenaed Exxon to investigate whether the company lied to the public and investors.

Over the next five years, the Times—a notoriously difficult medium for publicity-seeking public relations representatives to crack—nonetheless dutifully awarded Prof. Oreskes ample space to publish both “research studies” that challenged Exxon’s knowledge of climate change as well as op-ed articles elaborating on why her research was right.

The Times next appointed a full-time climate change reporter, a decent chap named John Schwartz, to focus on Exxon as the ringleader of climate change deniers.

It was Schwartz’s task to remind readers periodically of Exxon’s alleged deceit … first revealing that other state AGs had joined the New York Exxon investigation … then reporting on Oreskes’ “seminal” research of how Exxon misled the public … and finally announcing on Page One in 2018 that New York State had filed suit against Exxon for defrauding shareholders about the risks of climate change.

Triumphantly, in October 2018, Mr. Schwartz and the Times informed its readers—on the front page—that at long last, “New York Sues Exxon Mobil, saying it Defrauded Shareholders on Climate Change.”

During the trial’s three months, the Times remained in attack mode, periodically allowing Exxon enemies to hyperventilate on the op-ed page, hoping against hope to influence the judge to find the company guilty of sins against humanity.

Typical of the op-ed opprobrium was a hysterical rant by a notorious Exxon hat-trick halfway through the trial that called out the company and its industry for knowing full well that they were the primary culprits for a “planet headed toward a climate catastrophe, but they keep drilling away, trying to squeeze the last nickel from their deadly product.”

The writer concluded by applying a bit of what might graciously be characterized as “good-natured pressure” on the judge in the case by calling him out by name and beseeching him to “determine whether Exxon’s misrepresentations violated New York securities law.”

In the end, of course, as the Times reported in a short piece hidden inside the paper that you likely missed, the judge found in favor of Exxon. Indeed, despite the hysterical rantings of its critics, aided and abetted over the years by The New York Times, the judge concluded that the state “failed to establish by a preponderance of the evidence” that Exxon had done anything wrong.

After the verdict, the company commented that the case affirmed its position from the beginning that it had reported accurately over the years as the science on climate change became more certain and that the whole orchestrated campaign against it was, therefore, baseless.

New York AG Letitia James, on the other hand, wasn’t buying the Exxon blather. “For the first time in history,” she crowed, “Exxon Mobil was compelled to answer publicly for their internal decisions that misled investors.”

And all it cost to find out that the rabblerousers were wrong and the “bad guys” were telling the truth were several million dollars out of taxpayer pockets. Such a deal.

Fairness, sustainability defines Alpha Gen

Despite their young age, members of Generation Alpha—or those born after 2010—are highly conscientious and already maintain strong opinions regarding some of the biggest issues facing the world, according to research commissioned by Hotwire.

Hotwire’s report found that while 96 percent of Generation Alpha members believe that people should be treated fairly no matter what they look like, only 79 percent of Millennials and 58 percent of Baby Boomers said they considered this issue important when they were kids.

The concept of being accepted for who you are also ranked as a big issue of importance for Alpha respondents (93 percent), compared to 82 percent of Millennials and 78 percent of Baby Boomers.

Virtually all (95 percent) of Generation Alpha members polled said they consider taking care of the environment to be an important issue, compared to only 37 percent of Baby Boomers and 57 percent of Millennials. And more than a third (38 percent) of Generation Alpha said they think it’s important to recycle too, compared to less than a quarter (22 percent) of both Millennials and Baby Boomers.

When it comes to the issues that matter most to Generation Alpha kids, “keeping children safe at school” (97 percent), “making sure everyone has enough food to eat” (97 percent), ensuring that “boys and girls are treated fairly” (96 percent) and “making sure everyone has a place to live” (96 percent) were the issues to hold the highest rankings among these respondents.
Financial planning advice for PR principals

By Richard Goldstein

During the course of the year, I always get a few questions regarding whether paying off your mortgage makes financial sense.

Fewer Americans are paying off their mortgage before they retire. A Fannie Mae study found that less than 50 percent of homeowners age 65 to 69 were mortgage-free in 2015, down 10 percent from 2000. Despite the shift, you’ll probably come out ahead by eliminating your mortgage before you stop working. For starters, you’ll have a bigger cushion for other expenses that are often harder to predict, such as healthcare. It’s a good idea if …

When your mortgage is gone, you can probably reduce the amount you withdraw from your retirement accounts each month to cover living expenses. That’s a benefit when and if financial markets decline, because you won’t need to sell as many retirement investments that have dropped in value.

In addition, there’s the psychological benefit of knowing you’re free of this expense. If you’re like many people, your mortgage is your largest monthly bill.

What about itemizing …

One of the reasons often given for hanging onto a mortgage is the ability to deduct from your taxable income. But the 2017 “Job Cuts and Jobs Act” nearly doubled the standard deduction to $12,000 for single filers and $24,000 for joint filers. Even with a mortgage, you might not have enough total deductions to making itemizing worthwhile. Note, charitable donations and state and local taxes can be the tie-breaker here. If you have a $10,000 state and local income tax deduction and contribute $5,000 to charity, you’ll still end up using the standard deduction if a joint return is filed.

Some argue you can use the money you would put toward your mortgage to make other investments that may earn a higher return. But because almost all investments fluctuate in value, paying off your mortgage is likely to offer a more riskless return.

It doesn’t make sense when …

Although entering retirement mortgage-free can be a sensible move for many people, it’s not right for everyone. If you have credit card or other debt that carries a higher interest rate, you’ll want to whittle down those balances first. If you haven’t adequately funded your retirement accounts, you should do everything you can to boost those savings.

Also, liquidating a large portion of your investments to pay off your mortgage might leave you “house poor,” with much of your wealth tied to your home and not easily accessible in an emergency.

There might be penalties …

Before paying off your mortgage, check to insure there’s no prepayment penalty. The Dodd-Frank Act of 2010 limited lender’s ability to impose penalties on many mortgages, but it still makes sense to confirm this. Also, check that your lender will apply the extra payments to your principal, rather than to interest. This will help you pay off your mortgage as quickly as possible.

If you’re unsure of paying off your mortgage, your CPA can offer guidance.

Something extra

If you haven’t already checked the latest social security changes, this is what you need to know.

Based on the increase in the Consumer Price Index—from the third quarter of 2018 through the third quarter of 2019—Social Security and Supplemental Income beneficiaries will receive a 1.6 percent COLA for 2020. The tax rates for 2020 remain the same as 2019: employee 7.65 percent and self-employed 15.30 percent. The maximum taxable earnings for 2020 has increased to $137,700 from $132,900.

Activism is new normal, says RF study

More than half of Americans say they’ve taken actions to support a social cause during the past six months, according to a Ruder Finn survey.

Activism is becoming a regular activity for an increasing number of Americans, and that has a ripple effect on how they view a company’s activities and behavior, according to a study from Ruder Finn.

More than half (53 percent) of the almost 9,000 people surveyed for the study said they have taken actions to support a social issue in the past six months. For many of them, the level of commitment was even greater, with 13 percent saying they took such actions once a month, nine percent saying they did so several times a month, and four percent each saying they got involved once a week, a few times a week or daily.

And it’s not Millennials or GenXers who are the biggest fuelers of this trend. Almost a third (30 percent) of respondents age 34-49 said they were active in supporting a social issue, with the 50-64 age bracket following at 27 percent. Millennials lagged behind at 21 percent, trailed by Gen Zers at nine percent.

Companies are taking a big part in how that activism is being carried out, the study found. While social media (31 percent) or news stories (26 percent) were the biggest influencers on actions, 25 percent were most influenced by either a company they work for or one that they like. Friends and family came in at 21 percent.

About a third of the actions that people took were related to a company, with half of them supporting a company whose social stance the respondent agreed with by either purchasing its products or sharing information about it. Nearly the same number went in the other direction by boycotting or quitting a company whose social stand was at odds with their opinions.

The companies that gained the most support for their stands on issues were Nike, Chick-fil-A, Apple, Amazon and Patagonia.

A negative reaction to a company’s social stance, however, need not be permanent. Almost three-quarters of respondents said they would forgive a company for its stand if a company executive explained why that stand was important, if they could see how that stance was related to a company’s products and services, or if they believed the stance was an essential part of the company’s history, with its employees being on board.

What matters most when a company is trying to make a case for its social stance with consumers? Authenticity. Respondents said that companies should be truly invested in the causes they support, rather than just taking a stance as a result of external pressures.

Number of journalists killed in action hits 16-year low

The Reporters Without Borders group says 49 journalists were killed during 2019, a 16-year low and a 44 percent drop from the number of journos who died during 2018. The dramatic fall-off from the average 80 journalists a year murdered over the past two decades is largely due to the decline of reporters killed in war zones.

For instance, the 17 reporters killed in Yemen, Syria and Afghanistan this year was half of the number who died in 2018. RWB though notes that the number of journalists killed in countries that are at peace continues to be as high as previous years. For instance, ten journalists were murdered in Mexico during 2018 and 2019. Latin America is now as dangerous for journalists as the war-torn Middle East.

“We welcome the unprecedented fall in the number of journalists killed in war zones,” RSF Secretary-General Christophe Deloire said in a statement, “but, at the same time, more and more journalists are being deliberately murdered in connection with their work in democratic countries, which poses a real challenge for the democracies where these journalists live and work.”

While the number of deaths of journalists declined, RWB reports a 12 percent rise to 389 in the number of arbitrarily jailed reporters. China, Saudi Arabia and Egypt account for half of the number of detained journalists.

Soros-backed group tackles immigration law

The Open Society Policy Center, the public policy organization established and funded by billionaire philanthropist George Soros, has retained Washington-based government relations firm NVG to advocate on behalf of an immigration reform bill currently making its way through Congress.

OSPC has retained NVG to pitch support for H.R.2214 and S.1123, the “NO BAN Act,” which would limit a U.S. President’s ability to restrict aliens from entering the country, as seen in the “travel ban” that President Trump introduced via executive order in 2017.

The NO BAN Act was introduced earlier this year by Rep. Judy Chu (D-CA) and Senator Chris Coons (D-DE).

A four-person team heads the account, including Joshua Hurvitz, who was previously Legislative Director to former Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-NY); Eden Shiferaw, a former Staffer to Congresswoman Marcia L. Fudge (D-OH); Irene Bueno, who was Deputy Assistant Secretary at the HHS and a Special Assistant to President Clinton in the chief of staff’s office as well as the Domestic Policy Council; and Andrea LaRue, who served as Counsel to former Senator Majority Leader Tom Daschle.

Juul turns to Tiger Hill Partners

Juul Labs has hired Tiger Hill Partners to handle federal lobbying efforts regarding legislation related to e-cigarettes and Congressional investigations.

The San Francisco-based company, which is 35 percent owned by Philip Morris USA corporate parent Altria, says it wants to reset the vapor category by hiking the user minimum age to 21, promoting high product standards, and promoting the effective enforcement against counterfeit and compatible products.

JHM Group Founder and Edelman alum James Maloney launched THP in November with political consultant/attorney Milan Dalal. Dalal, who was of counsel to Brownstein Hyatt Farber Schreck, economic advisor to Sen Mark Warner (D-VA) and Legislative Director for Rep Gregory Meeks (D-NY) handles the Juul business.

Juul spent $3.2 million for federal lobbying during the first nine months of 2019.

BGR recruits Cleveland Clinic’s Farmer

Dan Farmer, who was Senior Director of Government Relations at the Cleveland Clinic, is joining BGR Government Affairs.

He will be part of BGR’s access & reimbursement working group, focusing on regulatory and payment issues faced by hospitals, product manufacturers, doctors and patients.

Prior to joining the Cleveland Clinic, Farmer worked at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, where he was responsible for payment policy.

He directed $230 billion in payments to private health plans that were part of Medicare Advantage and nearly $100 billion in outlays for Medicare Part D.

Earlier, Farmer worked for Democratic Representatives Zack Space (OH) and Debbie Wasserman Schultz (FL).

Ketchum’s Schoeneman skips to Curley Co.

KayAnn Schoeneman, Ketchum Senior VP, PA Director and DC marketplace leader, has joined Curley Co. as Senior VP and Corporate/PA Director.

Prior to assuming command of Ketchum’s nearly 100-member Washington outpost, Schoeneman was part of the Omnicom unit’s global research & analytics team, overseeing staffers in DC, Atlanta, Dallas, Chicago, Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Schoeneman also did stints as VP-Communications for the Northern Virginia Chamber of Commerce and PA Director at Weber Merritt, campaign field analyst for the National Republican Congressional Committee and Public Information Officer for the US Court of Appeals.

Founded in 2003, Curley & Co. has done work for McDonald’s, Samsung, US Chamber of Commerce, Stuttering Foundation, AARP, Pet Leadership Council and Google.
Mercury targets NGOs for Qatar

Omnicom’s Mercury Public Affairs unit landed a $360,000 one-year contract with Qatar for research, advice and assistance regarding the work of nongovernmental policy institutions and academic institutions active in studying Middle East issues.

The firm works under the auspices of the public diplomacy office of Qatar’s Washington embassy.

The Arab state remains under an economic/political boycott by Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates, Egypt and others for its cozy relations with Iran and hosting the Al-Jazeera satellite TV network.

Mercury’s fee of $30,000 per-month could be bumped up to $40,000 in the event that the client requests that it plan, organize, staff and attend two separate thought leadership events in Qatar.

Senior VP Katherine Lewis (BGR alum) and Director Kaylee Otterbacher (former Aide to Wisconsin Republican Congressman Jim Sensenbrenner) are key personnel on the Qatar business.

CLS parachutes into Bolivia’s political mess

CLS Strategies has picked up a 90-day assignment to provide strategic counsel to the government of Bolivia, which has been rocked by political upheaval.

Former President Evo Morales, who ruled the country for 14 years, has been granted refugee status in Argentina.

He fled to Mexico following a contested election in October after his government was charged with manipulating the results.

Bolivia’s Interim President Jeanine Anez issued an arrest warrant for Morales, charging him with treason.

The job of CLS is to advise the government on strengthening democracy and human rights. It will work to ensure that the 2020 election is free and fair.

CLS’ representation is worth $90,000 over the three-month assignment. It’s in the process of finalizing a written agreement.

Partner Juan Cortinas, former Press Secretary for Florida Republican Congresswoman Ilena Ros-Lentinen & Communications Director for Puerto Rico federal affairs administration, and William Moore, who did PR work in Colombia, handle the Bolivia effort.

Omnicom owns CLS.

GOP pro Hathaway joins Saudi Arabia PR push

Hathaway Strategies has signed on to provide PR and media management services to Saudi Arabia’s Washington embassy.

The Indianapolis-based grassroots PA consulting shop is working as a subcontractor to LS2group, which inked a $1.5 million contract with the Saudis that began Nov. 1.

Anne Hathaway served as Chief of Staff for the Republican National Committee from 2007 to 2009, helping it to raise more than $400 million. She also developed RNC’s voter outreach techniques and voter identification programs.

Hathaway was Program Director for the 2012 GOP national convention in Tampa and its liaison to the Mitt Romney campaign.

Her firm’s contract runs from Nov. 22 through Oct. 31. It receives a $10,000 monthly fee.

Feintuch Communications enjoys deep crisis communications counseling experience — having provided support to non-profits, emerging growth companies and the Fortune 500. Our senior team can help to enhance and protect your organization’s reputation.

We work with your team to develop customized crisis communications plans; crisis preparation training; and 24/7 crisis counseling and communications support. We are well versed in helping organizations work their way through challenging crises including shareholder and corporate governance issues; employee or community problems; product recalls; litigation and government investigations. The best crisis plan? It’s the one developed NOW — before your organization’s reputation is under attack.

Fineman PR works extensively on reputation building, crisis preparedness, crisis communications and reputation recovery with a wide range of organizations, from schools and municipalities to food companies and Fortune 500 corporations.

Fineman PR’s successful, high-profile crisis work includes helping our client respond to and recover from a national public health crisis, managing consequences from the Santa Barbara “Tea Fire” for a college beset by the firestorm; initiating client-community relations after a tragic apartment complex explosion in Truckee, California; putting a juice company on firm public footing immediately after an E. coli crisis; setting the record straight after media slander of packaged salads; helping resolve labor relations for a highly prestigious medical group in Southern California; and working for so many other clients whose names were successfully kept out of the news.

ReviveHealth, a Weber Shandwick company, is a full-service agency focused on the intersection of healthcare delivery, finance, and innovation. The agency’s work has been recognized as Healthcare Agency of the Year Finalist (The Holmes Report), and the Crisis Communications Agency of the Year (Black Book). Headquartered in Nashville with other offices in Boston, Santa Barbara, and Minneapolis, ReviveHealth’s dedicated Issues practice is led by veterans with proven experience in helping high profile healthcare clients overcome controversy, protect the reputation of their brand, and build public support. Through strategies deeply rooted in an understanding of today’s unpredictable and turbulent healthcare environment — and holding a firm grasp of the rapidly changing media and stakeholder environment — we execute programs that advance and protect the reputation of our clients, pro-actively manage risk across their enterprise, and position them for what’s next.

The global network encompasses public relations companies and offices in North and South America, Europe and Asia. The network continues to seek new members in strategic locations.

The Public Relations Global Network (PRGN) is a connected network of 50 hand-selected public relations firms servicing key markets around the world. With revenues of more than $87 million, PRGN is one of the world’s five largest international public relations networks. As leaders in our respective regions, PRGN agencies offer the “boots-on-the-ground” savvy of a local PR agency, yet on a global scale. Our model allows us to deliver a unique level of flexibility — scaling up or down across multiple markets to meet your business needs. Each PR agency knows its local community and it knows how to help clients connect with their audiences in those regions. PRGN member agencies harness the resources of more than 1,000 communications professionals serving a total of 1,800 international companies and organizations. www.prgn.com

We expertly manage your SMT and provide a complete solution including the booking of all of the interviews, studio rental and equipment, satellite uplink, make-up and catering services, and all of the technical and production needs to make your SMT the most successful it can be.

We also specialize in booking radio tours with national news networks, nationally syndicated shows, statewide, regional, and local radio outlets in each of the nation’s nearly 300 radio markets. Strauss Media also conducts radio and television ground tours.

Moreover, we script, produce, and distribute targeted audio news releases to the nation’s largest radio networks with the best “guaranteed-placement” in the industry. In addition, Strauss Media provides:

- Audio Actuality Pitching and Placement Systems
- Radio Promotions
- Public Service Announcements
- Audio and Video Podcasts
- Radio Advertising Production and Placement
- Live Remote Broadcasts
- Customized Broadcast E-mailing (with our database of 12,000+ radio and television outlets, stations and show contacts)
- Satellite Uplinks and Downlinks
- Media Training

Among the hundreds of clients we have worked with, we routinely work with political groups such as the DNC; advocacy groups like the Sierra Club; award-winning PR firms like BCW, Edelman, Porter Novelli, MSLGroup, Hager Sharp and Aspo; non-profit clients like Safe Kids Worldwide, the American Jewish Committee (AJC) and the National Safety Council; government agencies like the Dept. of Veterans Affairs; associations such as the US Conference of Mayors, National Law Enforcement Officers Memorial Fund (NLEOMF) and No Labels; large-scale events such as the Clinton Global Initiative and the major auto shows; major companies like Uber, Facebook, and General Motors; and we have worked on dozens of local, state and federal political campaigns. The company is also proud to be on the official GSA Schedule.

JOB SEEKERS,
YOUR NEXT
PUBLIC RELATIONS
CAREER OPPORTUNITY
COULD BE CLOSER THAN YOU THINK.

Job Seeker Benefits

• Access to high quality, relevant job postings. No more wading through postings that aren’t applicable to your expertise.

• Personalized job alerts notify you of relevant job opportunities.

• Career management – you have complete control over your passive or active job search. Upload multiple resumes and cover letters, add notes on employers and communicate anonymously with employers.

• Anonymous resume bank protects your confidential information. Your resume will be displayed for employers to view EXCEPT your identity and contact information which will remain confidential until you are ready to reveal it.

• Value-added benefits of career coaching, resume services, education/training, articles and advice, resume critique, resume writing and career assessment test services.
