Lies, lies and more lies

Love him or hate him, James Comey nails it. On the first page of his book, A Higher Loyalty: Truth, Lies, and Leadership, the former FBI Director clearly lays out the problem of living in our current post-truth era.

“We are experiencing a dangerous time in our country, with a political environment, where basic facts are disputed, fundamental truth is questioned, lying is normalized, and unethical behavior is ignored, excused or rewarded,” wrote Comey in the 300-page tome. “This is not just happening in our nation’s capital, and not just in the US. It is a troubling trend that has touched institutions across America and around the world — boardrooms of major companies, newsrooms, university campuses, the entertainment industry and professional and Olympic sports.”

The post-truth era makes a PR person long for the good old days of “spin,” where facts were repackaged to appeal to an audience’s emotions or instincts to prompt group action. Spin, at least, had facts at its core.

Donald Trump, of course, is the ringmaster of the circus of deceit and confusion.

The Washington Post’s Fact-Checker blog reported on May 1 that the President made 3,001 false or misleading claims in his first 466 days of office.

Perhaps feeling more comfortable — or desperate — in the job, the President has stepped up the pace of falsehoods, according to the WaPo. Trump averaged 4.9 bogus claims daily during his first 100 days. That jumped to 6.5 claims daily during the 466-day period.

Trump is a firm believer in the Big Lie theory, where the falsehood is repeated again and again.

The Post reported the President has made the same 113 false claims at least three times. They include whoppers such as he passed the biggest tax cut in history (actually it was the eighth largest) and that the Democrats really don’t care about the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) program that Trump killed.

Comey, who may have the best insight into the mind of Trump, told CNN last month that Trump makes a “series of assertions about the great things that he has done” and they just “wash over you like a wave and even if you disagree the waves keep coming.” He numbs people into submission.

In Comey’s view, it’s pointless to try to correct every exaggeration that flows out of Trump’s mouth because you would be constantly interrupting him.

The former G-Man is wrong. That’s just what the nation needs.

My grandmother used to threaten me that she’d wash my mouth out with soap if I ever lied. The White House could use a shipment of soap right about now. ☢

Americans like Facebook, distrust Facebook

Two-thirds of Americans professed that they still like Facebook, yet more than half admitted they no longer trust the platform, according to a recent poll on Americans’ perceptions of tech companies.

Facebook continues to face a major trust backlash in light of its ongoing Cambridge Analytica scandal, yet paradoxically, an overwhelming number of Americans said they still like the platform.

Two-thirds of Americans — 66 percent — professed liking Facebook, while 55 admitted they no longer trust the site, according to a recent poll on Americans’ perceptions of tech companies released by San Francisco-based tech firm Bospar.

Overall, the study found that Americans’ favorite tech company is Google. An impressive 88.9 percent of respondents said they like the search engine giant, and 78 percent said they also trust the company. Microsoft took a close second place, earning an 83.7 percent favorability rating and a trust rating of 77.6 percent. Despite its high rate of user distrust, Facebook came in third for most-liked company. LinkedIn, Uber and Twitter followed the social media giant, but of those companies, only Uber trailed Facebook in the distrust department.

The Bospar poll asked Americans how long is too long for a company to wait before responding to a crisis, and found that more than one in three — 35 percent — answered 24 hours. Nearly a third — 29 percent — said 48 hours, and 16 percent followed with 72 hours.

The poll’s findings came as Facebook CEO Mark Zuckerberg testified before Capitol Hill lawmakers last month, first appearing at a five-hour hearing before a joint session of the Senate Judiciary and Commerce Committees and then before the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Facebook continues to face mounting criticism after data analysis and political consulting firm Cambridge Analytica improperly gained access to the personal data of 87 million of the site’s users in a bid to pitch them Trump-related materials for the 2016 election. Facebook admits that it knew about the problem as far back as 2015, but didn’t publicly confirm the leak until the New York Times broke news of the scandal in March.

When asked what recent tech-related PR crisis was handled the best, nearly half of respondents cited Apple’s admissions in December 2017 that it had intentionally slowed down the performance of older iPhone models via its operating software updates. The least admired crisis response involved the recent security breach of athletic apparel brand Under Armour’s MyFitnessPal app, which compromised as many as 150 million user accounts.

Bospar’s study was conducted in early April by market research company Propeller Insights and polled more than 1,000 U.S. adults online.

TV news jobs top newspaper reporters

Local TV newsrooms employ more staffers than daily newspapers, according to a joint survey conducted by Hofstra University and broadcast and journalism organization Radio Television Digital News Association.

Reporting on the survey’s findings, the RTDNA in a statement said it’s the first time total local TV employment has surpassed total daily newspaper employment in the annual survey’s 25-year history. The average TV newsroom has had more staffers than the average daily newspaper for several years now.

The 2018 RTDNA/Hofstra report shows that local TV newsroom employment currently stands at 27,100, just below the industry’s all-time high of 27,900 in 2001. By contrast, the report said total daily newspaper employment currently stands somewhere between 24,000 and 25,000.

The report mentions that total local TV news jobs actually declined slightly in 2017, dipping 1.8 percent from 27,600 employees in 2016. Median newsroom size and average full-time total TV news staffing had dipped slightly as well. The report cited a continued consolidation of local TV news for much of this loss.

According to the report, nearly 90 percent of news directors said they expect staffing levels to either increase or remain roughly the same within the coming year. The report found that the largest share of newly-created newsroom positions over the past year were jobs dedicated to digital platforms (web, social media or other digital media positions). Nearly 20 percent of newly-created positions at newsrooms were digital-focused, and digital roles overall (web/mobile writer or producer, social media producer or editor and digital content manager) increased an average of 2 percent, from 2.1 in 2016 to 2.3 in 2017. The report also found that various web/digital responsibilities have become increasingly integrated into existing newsroom roles.

Finally, the report found that average hiring at radio stations has remained virtually unchanged in the last year, as has radio web staffing positions. Non-commercial radio stations were three times more likely to expect to add new staff than their commercial counterparts.

The 2018 RTDNA/Hofstra University Survey was conducted during the fourth quarter of 2017 and polled 1,683 operating, non-satellite TV stations as well as a random sample of 3,542 radio stations. Talled responses came from 1,333 television stations (79.2 percent) as well as 415 radio news directors and general managers representing 1,110 radio stations.

Mobile ad spends to top TV in ’18

Nearly 70 percent of all digital advertising is slated to appear on mobile devices this year, with mobile accounting for nearly 34 percent of total U.S. ad spends in 2018, according to recent estimates by digital market research company eMarketer.

TV ads, meanwhile, are expected to comprise a 31.6 percent share of total U.S. ad spends this year, meaning that mobile ads are now slated to outpace TV for the first time.

Overall, eMarketer says mobile advertising will grow at a rate of nearly 24 percent this year, surpassing total media’s combined 6.6 percent growth by more than three times.

By contrast, eMarketer expects that only 14.6 percent of the total U.S. ad share will go to print this year, followed desktop/laptops 9.1 percent and radio’s 6.5 percent.

eMarketer’s recent estimates predict that mobile’s share will surge to account for nearly half — 47.9 percent — of the U.S. ad market by 2022.
Fewer than 17 percent—16.7 percent—of consumers said they’re comfortable with the idea of third-party app developers acquiring and using their personal information for marketing purposes, according to a recent survey by intelligence platform Vision Critical.

On the other hand, most consumers said they don’t mind sharing their personal data if it adds value to their overall customer experience, and particularly if brands are open and transparent regarding how that information will be used.

The survey found that a majority of consumers—66 percent—said they’re comfortable with the practice of sharing their personal information, as long as brands proactively tell them how they’re going to utilize that data. And nearly half of respondents—42 percent—also said they’d be more willing to share that information if they had an opportunity to edit or delete it.

Improving online consumer privacy protections has become a sort of clarion call in the weeks following Facebook’s data crisis, in which Trump-linked data analysis and political consulting firm Cambridge Analytica illicitly harvested the data of an estimated 87 million Facebook users in order to pitch them political messages in the months before the 2016 presidential election.

Consumer data has always been social media networks’ bread and butter, yet the Cambridge Analytica scandal has apparently caught many consumers in disbelief regarding the fact that the crumb-trail of data we leave behind in the digital realm is precisely why we’re invited to establish online residences on these channels for free. As a result, consumers are now paying more attention to the data they share online and what companies do with it, with many calling for improved transparency guidelines regarding the information that networks and third-party app developers acquire and share.

The Vision Critical survey suggests that by adding a few transparency provisos, brands could go a long way in improving both how they treat consumers’ personal information as well as the relationships they currently have with loyalists.

The survey found that an overwhelming majority of respondents—80.1 percent—said they’re comfortable sharing personal information directly with brands for the sake of receiving more personalized messages. Nearly half of those polled—41 percent—said they’re willing to share personal information if it results in more personalized service or faster conflict resolution.

More than half of those polled—58 percent—also admitted that they’re more likely to respond to personalized messages from brands.

The Vision Critical survey polled more than 1,000 adults in North America who said they’d made a digital purchase within the past year.
Helping purpose-driven companies reach their goals

How to lead integrated communications campaigns that enhance the impact and protect the reputations of purpose-driven clients.

By Michael Roth

hen articles began popping up about “purpose-driven companies” years back, I must admit that I found the concept kind of odd.

Having worked in life sciences for more than two decades in therapeutic areas like ALS, Parkinson’s, Depression, Gaucher’s Disease and Oncology, it was clear that the “purpose” of our clients’ work was improving and saving people’s lives. Similarly, the “purpose” of healthcare communications was to help people understand the value of these medical breakthroughs that impact them or their family members and help as many people gain access to the product or device as possible. We were under no illusion that profit — and sometimes, greed — played a big role in the industry, but above all of this was a greater “purpose.”

For this reason, many people in healthcare communications tend to cast a jaundiced eye at other industries: consumer goods, banking, travel. In our collective minds, their only “purpose” is to make money. The truth is, many other industries have a noble and purpose-driven heritage.

Let’s take two high profile American insurance companies as examples. MetLife’s “purpose” is to provide a financial safety net for American families that are looking to protect all that they have built in their lives. MetLife began its journey in 1863 when a group of New York City businessmen raised $100,000 to found the National Union Life and Limb Insurance Company. The company insured Civil War sailors and soldiers against disabilities due to wartime wounds, accidents, and sickness. In anyone’s mind, a truly noble purpose. In 1868, the Company changed its name to Metropolitan Life Insurance Company and shifted its focus to the life insurance business. While the Company evolved, the purpose remained: to serve the community with real individual impact.

Similarly, Aetna had a purpose-driven heritage: to help victims of fires recover from devastation that seemed to be epidemic in American cities in the 1800s. Aetna was known for many years as Aetna Fire Insurance Company. While their business model has evolved quite a bit over time, a steadfast dedication to purpose and impact upon the community that they served was never an issue. In recent years, Aetna has evolved from a health insurance company to a healthcare company, focusing on its members’ wellness (versus sickness), their personalized health ambitions, social determinants of health and the importance of localization of healthcare. They have become an ideal example of a purpose-driven company.

What is a real purpose-driven company?

There are, of course, numerous companies in other industries that share a purpose-driven heritage: industries like travel, utilities, transportation, professional services and even banking. But heritage is not a prerequisite for building a purpose-driven company. Many companies in the modern age are trying to figure out exactly where they fit into this not-so-new, conceptual paradigm. How can they be purpose-driven, and if it’s not about corporate heritage or even product or service output, what exactly is a purpose-driven company?

While there’s no definitive definition, it’s clear that “purpose-driven” companies of all kinds are born out of one simple idea: it is the obligation of every business (and every person) to improve the world in even the smallest way.

A purpose-driven business need not be totally selfless or philanthropic, but you must identify a genuine need within society (e.g., psychological, emotional, physical) and work hard to fill that need. Your work must have a positive impact on the communities that you serve including direct targets, employees and non-customers.

The rationale for becoming a purpose-driven business is also simple. When there’s a real emotional connection to a brand, there’s more trust between the customer, community and the company. And this relationship is more conducive to a fruitful business relationship. It makes common sense.

Purpose-driven doesn’t mean perfect

One would think that a company’s allegiance to positively impacting society would make it easier to map out its narrative, messaging, content, thought leadership and social media. Not so fast. There’s still the age-old nemesis of advocacy-based communications, which is the reality of the situation. Persuading the public that they need sneakers because it will help fix the dearth of inner city jobs, or that they need a five-dollar cup of coffee because fair trade and the rain forest is critical to us all, is a tough sell. There must be real connective utility, substance and transparency behind the brand promise, vision and “purpose.” Consumers must feel and see the impact.

Sometimes there are activities or incidents that fall outside of the company “purpose,” or even fly in the face of that purpose: the death of a patient because a health insurance claim was rejected, or a pill didn’t work right, or an exploding product that creates institutional mistrust. Even purpose-driven businesses are subject to failure because of human or other mistakes, in spite of a company’s best intentions.

Proving purpose after a setback

The biggest setback — and potential turnaround — that I’ve seen in recent years to a brand purpose started on April 12 in a Pennsylvania Starbucks. Two black men were wrongfully arrested in a racially-biased incident. Starbucks’ purpose is to inspire and nurture the human spirit: one person, one cup, one neighborhood at a time. And this incident directly contradicted that purpose.

Starbucks’ CEO acted immediately to make certain that their purpose was not compromised. In addition to firing the manager that used poor judgement and had the men arrested, their CEO met with the two men to apologize directly to them for the harm that his company has caused them and the community. Starbucks announced that it will close all its coffee shops on May 29 to provide racial bias training to nearly 175,000 employees. The training — aimed at preventing discrimination at Starbucks shops — comes in response to swift public outcry and the company’s commitment to accountability and change.

Interviews with Starbucks’ CEO after the meeting with the two men wrongfully arrested demonstrated his authentic distress and regret. Starbucks is vested in the community, and they will now work hard to make sure that racial discrimination is never tolerated in its stores or communities. We’ll see what happens in the coming months, but the corporate response of strong words, combined with clear action, seemed to be elevated by its institutional belief in its purpose.

Breaking down complex comms for the C-Suite

Public relations professionals fall in love with our own jargon, using words like “visibility,” “content,” “reach” and “frequency,” “impressions” and “channels.” It’s no wonder that sometimes C-Suite leaders don’t know what to do with us.

By Matt Kucharski

On the other hand, PR pros’ role has never been more critical. Important goals and initiatives will succeed if they are clearly understood and widely appreciated, and we make that happen. It’s a complex time for communicators, but we must avoid the trap of transferring that to the people and organizations we serve.

Clear purpose and well-defined stakeholders are foundational. After that, the keys to success break down into the Message, the Messenger and the Method.

Taking a different view of “the message”

The most common C-Suite complaint is “we need a better message.” Let’s unravel that. What makes them think it’s wrong? What does “better” look like? More importantly, the executive, by making the claim in the first place, demonstrates a lack of understanding of what good messaging really is.

There’s never been a communications challenge that didn’t require changing opinions and behaviors of multiple groups of people, all with different interests and motivations. One message to get them all on board is wishful thinking. Instead, we need key message sets for each audience that all roll up under a common narrative.

At Padilla, we use a Message Pyramid that starts with a core theme or idea (what execs mistakenly refer to as “the message”), an elevator story (often termed “the narrative”), key message sets (organized by audience or topic), and proof statements (reasons to believe).

There’s been a shift in the types of messages that resonate with different audiences driven by a well-documented increase in skepticism and lack of trust in traditionally revered institutions. Aristotle coined the words ethos, pathos and logos to categorize the three main persuasive methods. Ethics focuses on experience, pathos focuses on passion and logos focuses on logic.

C-Suite executives love ethos messages: talking about years of experience, market share, breadth and depth of product offerings, and other key points that demonstrate authority and longevity. They say, “trust me, I’ve been here and I know what I’m doing.”

The problem is, people don’t care. If you say you’ve been in business 150 years, a Millennial just thinks you’re old. If you talk about your market share, a consumer thinks you have too much control. A customer doesn’t want breadth and depth of product line; they want products specifically for their needs. When ethos messaging doesn’t apply, we fall back on logos messaging, citing scientific studies and test results to show why “we’re right.”

But as Richard Thaler, winner of the Nobel Prize for his work in behavioral economics has proved, it’s often our emotions that drive decision making, which has resulted in more need for messaging based on pathos. Not-for-profits have focused on pathos (probably to an unhealthy extreme) for years, and we’re seeing it emerge as an important messaging approach in corporate settings as well.

A “single message” is not only unrealistic, it’s also ineffective. Instead, we need to be using a mix of ethos, pathos and logos-based messaging, choosing the right mix with the help of research-based audience insights.

Don’t pick the wrong messenger

In contrast to “the message,” very few executives point to “the messenger” as a key part of the strategy, assuming it as a given or dismissing it as unimportant.

But a great message will be squandered if delivered by the wrong messenger.

Sometimes the CEO is the best choice. Sometimes not. When Facebook was called before Congress to account for its mishandling of user personal data, the only right messenger was CEO Mark Zuckerberg. When Tony Hayward, CEO of BP during the Deepwater Horizon accident, said he “wanted his life back” in the midst of the company’s disaster response, he was fired.

That resulted in a shift to different messengers for different audiences.

Smart companies know when they are not the best messenger. We all know that a major corporation telling a teenager not to text and drive will have zero impact, which is why AT&T’s successful “It Can Wait” campaign uses stories from real people who have been victims — or perpetrators — of distracted driving.

Using the right messenger is fundamental to effective social media strategy. A brand that posts about itself will usually receive a less desirable response when compared to that same message delivered by more trusted and believable members of the social media community. It’s urgent for brands and companies to build their network of social media followers before a critical issue occurs, so that they can be leveraged as advocates during difficult times.

The right method among the madness

And then there’s the method. We all know the PESO model, where an “integrated” campaign is supposed to have paid, earned, shared and owned channels.

The problem is, the PESO model isn’t like choosing a sandwich at the deli: pick your bread, pick your meat and cheese, pick your condiments, warm it up or take it cold. It’s about picking the method of communication that is going to achieve the most effective outcome.

Companies today are no longer breaking news with national business outlets like the Wall Street Journal or the New York Times, but instead are opting for the most influential online trade publication because that’s what their customers and employees are reading. Likewise, a public service announcement that used to be pitched to numerous television news outlets now has just as much chance of getting viewed by making it available on Vimeo, YouTube, Amazon, iTunes, or Hoopla (or a combination of all).

So, when the CEO comes to you and tells you that the company needs your help in communicating a major initiative, instead of discussing the complexity of the challenge, break it down into the Message, the Messenger and the Method. Not only will he or she appreciate your ability to simplify the complex, you’ll improve the likelihood that Communications is seen as an essential part of the company’s success.

Matt Kucharski is President of Padilla.

Joelle Frank backs Germany’s Knauf in fight for USG

Joelle Frank, Wilkinson Brimmer Katcher supports Germany’s Knauf in its proxy fight with building products competitor USG Corp. of Chicago.

Knauf, which has made a $5.9 billion bid for USG, is urging shareholders to vote against four USG director nominees at the May 9 annual meeting.

USG, which relies on Sard Verbinnen & Co., said Knauf’s bid is “wholly inadequate, opportunistic and without the intrinsic value of the company.”

Knauf, which owns about 10 percent of USG, knocks it for failing to engage in serious negotiations or show “substantive evidence to support its claim that the company is worth more than $42 per-share.

Joelle Frank, Ed Trissel and Annabelle Rinehart represent Knauf. SV&C’s Jim Barron and Pam Greene work the media for USG.
You need the right people today to succeed tomorrow

By Christine Barney

Even if you are on the right track, you will get run over if you just sit there.” This quote from Will Rogers is a humorous warning to today’s business owners. What got you where you are today is often not enough to ensure you’ll be successful tomorrow.

Continued growth is a challenge every business faces and the ability to scale is often heralded as proof of success. As rbb embraced its aggressive growth plans to create the communications agency of the future and double in size by 2020, we knew those plans required broader shoulders.

That’s why we invested in growing our leadership team over the last decade and are excited that nine senior members have become equity partners at the agency. These aren’t phantom stock partners: they jumped in with both feet and bought their stock in rbb to get real equity.

The importance of “having the right people on the bus” was a hallmark of Jim Collins’ book “Good to Great.” “If you have the right people, you can change direction faster and will have self-motivated leaders who produce the best results to do something great,” Collins said. “Great vision without great people is irrelevant.”

These new partners not only believe in rbb’s ability to grow, they also understand that what has worked before is not the road map for the future. The trains coming down the communications track are moving faster than ever. Far too many companies have jumped off the tracks and remain stranded on the sidelines offering the same traditional advertising and PR services.

Those companies who embrace technology, understand the changing information needs of today’s consumer and are flexible enough to bring the right tools to each situation are the ones who will succeed. That’s why rbb has consciously evolved to become a fully integrated communications firm offering marketing, digital/social, advertising/creative, PR and reputation management.

When it comes to solving a client’s problems, we start with a strategic consulting process that determines the best combination of tools. Otherwise, the adage holds true: If you only have a hammer then everything looks like a nail.

Brands today require and deserve a 360-degree view of how to use communication to build their bottom line. rbb’s Breakout Brand philosophy is based on the idea that communication success — for both internal and external audiences — comes from creating emotional connections.

Today that means using video, third-party influencers, apps galore, crowdsourcing and employee engagement tools, as well as having the skills of a digital ninja to cut through the clutter.

That doesn’t mean the focus is all internet and apps. Being able to put experienced, thoughtful, senior executives in the same room with CEOs, COOs and CMOs and give them straight counsel is just as critical. Smart counselors bring new perspectives to help C-level execs forge new business strategies, create new revenue streams and protect their brands.

We can only imagine what will be in our communications arsenal tomorrow. In fact, at rbb we spend quite a bit of time imagining and creating the tools and strategies we believe brands will need to grow and deliver exceptional customer experiences.

With a leadership team aligned for the future, rbb expects to help clients stay on track and take the curves with flair. Christine M. Barney, APR is Chief Executive Officer and Managing Partner of rbb Communications. She is also author of the Breakout Brand strategy, is accredited by the Public Relations Society of America and oversees the strategic development of all client programs.

Purpose-driven companies

...further a purpose-driven client's business objectives and enhance and protect its corporate reputation.

Executives exposed to media must be authentic, believable and transparent. The death knell of any purpose-driven corporation are people that don’t carry the brand purpose with them during interviews, regardless of the audience. Similarly, employees that appear to be oblivious to their brand promise can hurt the reputation of the entire company.

Corporate narrative and messaging must be tied to the purpose. Top down: demonstrate with words and actions how you’re fulfilling your purpose.

Have the courage to tell your client when they’re “off purpose.”

Leverage your target audiences: the beneficiaries of your purpose-driven work. If there is a true positive impact, your customers should want to speak about it. Leverage their words and personification of your purpose. SHOW how you impact the community.

Don’t be afraid to acknowledge other purpose-driven companies. You’re part of a community. The old idea of competition isn’t all that appealing to the next generation. Companies are less like a football game than a giant music festival. There are no enemies, just different companies playing in different places. Wish everyone well.

Tusk pitches world’s first legal tender cryptocurrency

Tusk Ventures is promoting the Republic of the Marshall Islands’ plan to introduce the world’s first legal tender cryptocurrency.

RMI has partnered with Neema Ltd, an Israeli startup that facilitates global money transfers via app and has used blockchain technology to create a digital currency called the Sovereign (SOV). The Pacific Ocean nation has passed a law making the SOV its official legal tender and is working with Neema to ensure a smooth roll-out.

Tusk’s statement of work says the firm is shaping the narrative to build support from the media, regulators, investors, pundits and crypto advocates/skeptics. It will pitch the SOV’s value proposition and show how it will benefit the people of the RMI by promoting transparency and good government. Tusk also will demonstrate how legal tender cryptocurrencies could help other small countries.

The New York-based firm will educate the US Treasury, State Dept., Securities and Exchange Commission and Internal Revenue Service about RMI’s strategy.

Tusk’s compensation will be split 50/50 between U.S. dollars and SOVs. Bradley Tusk was New York Mayor Mike Bloomberg’s campaign manager and New York Senator Chuck Schumer’s communications director.
Influencer marketing: choose wisely

Online influencer programs always carry an element of risk, leading many to rethink whether influencer marketing is the right strategy for their brand.

By Ashley Butler

For a while now, you may have heard the mantra that influencer marketing is a staple in any well-rounded social media program. Yet, you’ve seen cases where it’s gone bad. From headlines about fake news, to “bots” posing as followers, to celebrity endorsements hurting big brands. Many savvy marketers are left questioning: is influencer marketing a fad or a solid strategy?

Like any successful communications effort, an influencer marketing program requires a focused approach and disciplined execution. When done right, influencer marketing can add third-party credibility to a brand, help companies become more accessible to consumers, and, depending on the type of influencer, amplify your content without heavy paid media dollars. However, there’s risk in putting a brand in the hands of a stranger and, therefore, influencer marketing requires an investment in time and resources to execute properly.

Consider the macro and micro view

As most marketers know by now, influencers are commonly categorized by reach, or audience size, and status, and fall into one of three groups: Celebrity, a well-known superstar who has mass reach; Macro-influencer, a person with a large following grown from building their online personal brand; and Micro-influencer, someone with a following of fewer than 10,000.

While celebrities and macro-influencers have gotten much of the fanfare to date, micro-influencers are proving their value. Micro-influencers have a hyper-engaged audience in a targeted topic area that engenders strong communication and engagement and, in many cases, higher conversion rates.

Research supports several advantages to working with micro-influencers. In the case of quality over quantity, a study by Marketerly found that as someone’s number of followers increases, the engagement rate decreases. Furthermore, research from Experity shows micro-influencers’ conversion rates are 22.2 times higher than other influencers, perhaps because they are found to be 74 percent more likely to encourage followers to buy or try a product or service.

Finally, the cherry on top as regards working with these influencers—they are often more affordable. According to Bloglovin’, 97 percent of micro-influencers charge $500 or less for a sponsored post on Instagram, compared to Kylie Jenner, who can reportedly get hundreds of thousands of dollars for a promotional post on the platform.

Picking the right influencer for your brand

Whether you are considering micro- or macro-influencers, there’s a science to selecting the right ones. Doing your homework upfront to identify the appropriate influencers to partner with will pay dividends on the back end.

Start by aligning the evaluation process to your overall social media strategy. Ensure you identify partners who will elevate your brand message, not dilute it. Outline program objectives, target audiences, content themes and guidelines for influencer content, as well as key performance indicators. These elements will directly inform the influencer selection criteria. From there, follow these best practices for developing effective partnerships and content that deliver your brand’s message to the right people.

Think relevance. Relevance measures the contextual fit for your brand and is critical when thinking about the parameters of selecting influencers. Starting with a large list of influencers, assess those who would be most relevant to your audience based on your brand. This can be done by applying brand personas to determine who is appropriate to engage with based on the categories and topics they are discussing. Define your campaign’s purpose and slot influencers into those categories based on their content themes, persona and audience engagement. Find people who naturally connect to your mission, topics, product or service.

Determine resonance. Identify the influencer’s level of engagement to determine resonance. Focus on influencers who have a committed and engaged following as this is a strong indication of authenticity. A strong influencer posts content that is consumable and likeable. As they say, it’s not how many friends you can count, but how many friends you can count on to create engagement and build brand awareness.

Evaluate the message. Be sure to vet the influencer’s content, thoroughly. As engaged as followers may be, sometimes an influencer’s content doesn’t fit your brand. For example, does the influencer have a strong following and post beautiful photos that would speak to your audience, but also employs controversial commentary? Might not be a good fit. Be vigilant when vetting content for highly political posts, obscenity, and competitor mentions, otherwise your campaign could quickly backfire.

Personalize your outreach approach. Once you find the right partner(s), tailor your communication and invitation to work together based on what you’ve learned about them. Show this person you’ve done your homework and how your brand is a good fit for their community. This is the first step to developing a strong relationship.

Build in backups. Cast a wide net for your search initially to account for influencers who decline to participate, which could be as high as 80 percent. There are many factors that play into influencer participation, including level of effort of the request (are you asking for a video or a text-based tweet), turnaround time (influencers have busy personal and work lives, too; make sure the production schedule allows for at least a week or ideally two) and content topic (is it sensitive in nature). Just like your brand on social media, many influencers follow their own content strategy and scheduling to build an engaged follower base.

Establish your goals and how to track them. Essential to tracking results is setting clear goals and metrics upfront. Define your metrics, including the targeted quality and quantity of interactions. Then closely monitor community engagement. Ask yourself: Does the influencer engagement feel authentic? What are the comments and questions from the community? Did the overall effort drive the desired levels of reach, click throughs or other impact? Based on your learnings, make changes and optimize your program in real time.

Employ technology. Once you define your influencer parameters, consider using tools such as GroupHigh, TapInfluence and IZEA to tap into influencer databases to build a long list of influencers. These tools can help you parse the digital landscape to get access to influencer names, social footprint, personal performance metrics and contact information. Some of these tools also facilitate outreach and can help manage the full transaction.

Influencer marketing programs remain a highly viable yet evolving opportunity. Know the risks and rewards before diving in too deep. Invest the hard work to choose social media mavens wisely so that these influencers actually influence to your advantage.

Why marketing and PR need each other

The most successful organizations are the ones in which marketing and PR programs share strategies and messaging, and coordinate on tactics as they work side-by-side to provide optimum results for a business.

By Jessica Tiller

W ho feels like they’re an expert in both marketing and public relations? Or better yet, who within the communications industry can clearly describe the difference to someone at a networking event? We’ve all been in that situation at some point in our careers. And to add to the complications — and blur the lines even further — today’s communications pros are usually juggling a mix of online marketing, advertising, and public relations.

All too often, businesses tend to think of marketing and PR as one and the same. Even worse, some companies tend to define marketing as responding to RFPs, while public relations is often reduced to sending out news releases and securing media coverage. Obviously, that approach is doomed to failure (and probably the reason some executives discount the importance of both disciplines).

Given that, let’s start with some basics. While today we hear about everything from relationship marketing to content marketing, marketing ultimately comes down to developing a demand for a specific product or service, analyzing data to determine what is or isn’t work and fulfilling the customer’s needs. Public relations, on the other hand, is defined as the strategic communications process that builds mutually beneficial relationships between organizations and their audiences.

Clearly, you can see how PR and marketing tend to — or should — be joined at the hip, with both supporting a company’s sales efforts and/or advancing an organization’s overall business objectives. To have marketing and public relations departments operate within individual silos at any company, large or small, really does give the organization. While we may be a little biased, the most successful organizations tend to be the ones with cohesive marketing and PR programs working side-by-side to promote a business. Think of marketing and PR like peanut butter and jelly or milk and cookies — they just go together.

What, then, are the benefits of a coordinated communications program, incorporating both marketing and PR?

Credibility

Utilizing marketing activities, such as compiling and analyzing data, informs public relations in order to create meaningful content. Having hard data from the marketing department can help PR to sharpen its audience focus and refine the tactics it employs. That, in turn, brings added credibility to the PR effort and a direct correlation between activities and results.

Consistency

Today’s business prospects and clients are bombarded with a seemingly limitless stream of information and an endless number of options. Surprising as it sounds, the average individual is hit with between 4,000-10,000 brand messages per day! As a result, psychologists have determined that it takes a minimum of seven mentions for a brand to even begin to register with the intended target.

To cut through all of that “noise,” businesses need to constantly remind their key audiences who they are, what products or services they offer, and why those products/services are preferable to those of competitors. Creating and then maintaining ongoing marketing and PR initiatives will help organizations to do exactly that. No initiative will have true success without the consistency.

Greater awareness

By employing complementary marketing and PR tactics, you will gain greater visibility for your business, helping you stand out from your competition. Marketing’s tactics are often focused on self-generated activities, such as company newsletters, electronic and printed materials, and brochures, while public relations activities are focused on earned opportunities, such as media coverage, awards, and speaking engagements.

Through a cohesive communications strategy — utilizing both marketing and PR — a business will be able to expand awareness of their organization’s products or services.

Allow for synergy

Marketing and PR can, and should, work together to better reach an intended audience. Because marketers and PR professionals already work in many of the same areas, it makes sense that their work could be done cooperatively. Marketing and PR need to share strategies, messaging and information, and then coordinate on the tactics moving forward.

Unifying messages

Both marketing and PR departments need to be on the same page — and use the same messaging — in order to optimize efforts and initiatives intended to reach current and prospective clients. What is the point of pushing out an e-newsletter or updating the website if the PR team is using messages that are outdated, focusing on the wrong aspects of the business, or describing the company in completely different terms?

Here’s a case in point: Several years ago, we were helping a client in the benefits space to develop a strategic communications plan. The top two executives could not understand why no one in their market seemed to know what they did. Some even mistook the company for a law firm, given its name.

In speaking to each of the executives, neither could quickly identify what their company was about or who their key audiences were. When they did start discussing these topics, they disagreed with each other. Clearly, if there's no agreed upon internal messaging, how will key audiences, who are bombarded daily with other brands, be able to understand who you are and what services you offer?

The bottom line: marketing and public relations need each other to provide optimum results. It’s not a line item that is negotiable. In today’s competitive business climate, a comprehensive, ongoing marketing and public relations program is a must.

Worth remembering are the words of Bill Gates: “If I was down to the last dollar of my marketing budget, I’d spend it on PR.”

Using chatbots to support social media storytelling

How communication pros can leverage chatbots in their arsenal of storytelling and strategic communications tools.

By David Perez

Chatbots are the newest trendy toy everyone’s talking about, and a technology that PR pros are racing to test out on their marketing campaigns. But how you use chatbots and the ways in which they’re integrated into your communication strategy makes all the difference insofar as whether you’re utilizing this powerful tool effectively.

Chatbots are artificial intelligence designed to emulate human interaction. The digital era has grown to intertwine public relations and marketing. Social media has erupted as one of the ultimate ways to communicate and reach your target audience. New and creative ways of reaching our audiences can be seen through responses on messaging apps like Facebook Messenger and WhatsApp. Chatbots are here to stay, and as communications professionals, here are simple ways to integrate chatbots into your communication plans.

Storytelling

Using chatbots to communicate with your audience is an effective way to let them know your story. It is ultimately still good-old-fashioned storytelling. Get personal and guide them through your journey. People connect with people, but one thing hasn’t changed, and it’s the power of stories. As professional storytellers, we can develop the bot to guide our Facebook user to pick their own adventure within our story. Guide the customer through the journey with an end goal. People like to share stories with value. They share stories that make them feel like insiders and stories of emotion. The more creatively we build our own story of adventure, the more memorable it becomes. Chatbots can help communicate our message, building an engaged following.

Direct communication

Email marketing 2.0 has been a term used to describe how to generate more interest, awareness or sales for a product. While many communication gurus continue to practice the art of email marketing, some have moved into direct communications through messenger platforms such as Facebook Messenger and WhatsApp, via chatbots. The ability to connect “one to one” is more powerful than the “one to many” approach. This form of communication creates the ability to build brand loyalty and establish a relationship with your audience. Of course, you will get those people who opt out eventually, but your audience becomes an engaged audience, ultimately evolving into brand ambassadors. Building the perfect conversation takes practice, research and occasionally updating the bot as necessary.

Content distribution

Ever wonder why you only have 10 views during your Facebook Live event? The ability to send direct information to your followers has been simplified. With platforms that are used to create chatbots like ManyChat and Chatfuel, communications pros can send direct information to their audiences. The chatbot can distribute a new piece of content, statement from the company or product launch right into your user’s notification. When building a chatbot, help guide your user by asking them questions. Simple buttons can be added when building the chatbot. Understand where your audience wants to end. Your end goal is imperative when mapping out the journey. Ask for their permission to be able to receive notifications and exclusive company news. Making them feel part of an exclusive club, receiving items they can only view on Messenger, creates bigger want and a driving force to join in on the fun.

Data collection

What is it your audience really wants to hear? What type of content should we create and share? We all have heard that content is king. As we move into a new era, quality content targeted to a specific audience becomes more imperative than the quantity produced. Communications professionals need to understand what content will resonate with a specific audience. As your bot interacts with your audience, you can start developing custom content built on your audience’s responses. Instead of asking a question through your newsfeed, create a question on Messenger. Build exclusivity and have interactions. Build your bot to walk through a series of questions that will generate more data. As communicators, we are always talking and looking for ways to reach new audiences. We need to listen and understand what our audiences want. Once we understand our target audience, we can create a fluid distribution method generating an increase in buzz. A specific post may be shared and engaged in more due to the “How to…” video clip you created. All generated from your chatbot. Your audience will continue to build and create the ability to awareness.

Customer service

Make the user feel heard. Communications is a two-way street. Understand how to communicate with your audience. Build a customer service bot to help your current customers. Do not ignore those relationships. Chatbots are an ideal way to engage with your audience as a customer service. Spreading awareness is important, but building loyalty is imperative to reaching out to new customers. We have returned to our favorite store because of exceptional customer service. As more people are shopping online, we want to build a communication network that helps and continues to strengthen relationships. Pre-load ed messages can be drafted to contact customer service or send a link to the latest article to fix a minor concern.

This time saving tool can help increase consumer satisfaction. Making the consumer feel heard is important when retaining those relationships.

Building your virtual assistant can bridge your communication gap. Strategize on where and how to integrate your chatbot into your plan. Understand your communications goal and use this tool to create a better line of communication. Whether you are telling your story, distributing content or asking questions, this powerful tool will help you distribute to a new range of audiences and create ambassadors.

What story will you program your bot to tell?

Comcast taps Tulchan in bid for Sky

Comcast is using Tulchan Communications to handle its $31 billion offer to buy Sky, European pay TV operator, setting up a potential bidding war with 21st-Century Fox.

Sky, which had agreed to a takeover by 21CF, has now ended that pact because of the superior Comcast offer. 21CF, which owns a 39 percent stake in Sky, says it’s committed to acquiring the remaining shares.

Comcast sees Sky’s 23 million customers in the UK, Italy and Germany as a platform for further growth on the Continent.

The Philadelphia-based owner of NBCUniversal says the addition of Sky’s customer base will enable it to invest in more original and acquired programming.

Comcast CEO Brian Roberts pledges to preserve Sky’s editorial independence and refrain from acquiring a majority interest in any British newspaper for five years to help ensure media diversity.

Tulchan’s Andrew Grant and Tom Murray are working the Comcast bid.

As we reflect on the first quarter of 2018, some interesting trends have started to evolve in the VC and startup communities. I took some time with my colleagues to dig into what markets are trending and how PR pros can better establish relationships with the movers and shakers in the VC community.

What are some of the markets or industries you are seeing funded today?

Ryan Wallace, VP & GM, New York: Advanced Manufacturing is a critical industry. In fact, NYC is the number one market for 3D printing. Robotics, cybersecurity and health & life sciences are also burgeoning markets in New York right now.

Jennifer Malleo, VP & GM, San Francisco: I see money flowing into any company that’s got a security play, and lots of “middleware” brands, i.e., the companies that create the connections between other B2B businesses. Middleware has been a dirty word in PR, but the acquisition of MuleSoft, Twilio’s IPO, the much-anticipated Palantir IPO, and our own SF client roster tell a different story. These companies are printing cash and investors know it.

Katie Blair, VP & GM, Orlando: In the Southeast, the biggest opportunities are in the fintech, biotech, healthcare, martech and cybersecurity markets.

Lisa Astor, SVP & Co-Lead, Client Relations, Boston: Boston has always been a hub of innovation for healthcare IT and traditional data and security technologies. We’re also the home to robotics since the launch of iRobot and MIT’s significant investment in the space. And of course, biotech continues to be a cash cow with more than 1,000 biotech companies in Massachusetts.

How has this changed over the past few years? What are the next hot markets?

Wallace: Manufacturing in particular has started to grow and expand in “Industry City,” Brooklyn. Robotics has found a new home here as well. There is a real renaissance for manufacturing — from retail and apparel to biomedical to tech. It’s exciting to see this evolving in real time. We have seen heightened investment and significant deals closing in the New York market and, generally speaking, people are excited to see the cash flowing again in “Silicon Alley,” at a level we haven’t seen since 2015.

Malleo: I can tell you who it isn’t. First, apps are out of luck: They were the hottest funding sector up until a few years ago, and the money has dried up. SaaS-anything is also dead in the water because new entrants are now competing with established players. The industry that showed the most promise — fintech — has also fallen. Anything related to blockchain is super hot, and I expect it will stay that way for some time. Digital currencies are skyrocketing (overall) and VCs are falling over each other to get in on the underlying technology. Trusted social networks, or even niche social networks, are another potential area of interest that have gotten some play. Facebook may be the sacrificial lamb in a much broader trend relating to the security of individual data — what they’re willing to share vs. pay for, and whether communities can and should be trusted or accountable to users.

Blair: I think we will continue to see growth in SaaS organizations. With a growing presence of Fortune 500 companies located in the Southeast, B2B SaaS startups continue to attract large amounts of investor capital, commanding over $4.5 billion in more than 1,600 deals since 2012. Biotech/pharma and consumer technology also are growing sectors in the Southeast, with over $7 billion invested collectively, since 2012.

Astor: Advanced data analytics is the future of tech in Boston. Our great universities attract and retain a lot of talent and interest in technologies such as blockchain, IoT and big data. Data analytics and advanced manufacturing technologies will continue to grow as they are fueled by major tech brands funding innovation centers and labs across the city.

From an Integrated Marketing and PR perspective, are there particular strategies that play best to the VC communities and startups in your region? What tips do you have for PR pros?

Wallace: PR pros should try to connect with their counterparts at VCs to identify market needs and understand their local marketplace. Connect with your communication counterparts at the leading investment firms that are shaping the stories and the markets. To get in at the startup level and reach the “next big thing” you need to network and form relationships with the VCs. Become a player in the VC community, not just an observer. And to reach the investment community, we need to talk to VCs in their language through contributed content that 1) establishes the business impact your client can have and 2) spotlights the unseen financial benefits of your solution to investors and customers.

Malleo: VCs in the Bay Area are PR savvy. If you want to win them over, send in your best people to talk to them. They probably have better media relationships than the best PR agencies. For startups looking to draw attention to their brands from the VC community, dial down the product rhetoric (that’s sales’ job) and make sure you’ve got a great story. Every VC and reporter has heard it all before — you’re not going to teach them anything new. But you can bring them around to a new way of thinking about your business if you have a solid story. You have to know why you matter to the world, what big problem you’re solving.

Blair: It’s an exciting time for the Southeast as opportunity is knocking. The majority of companies here are looking for ways to differentiate their products/solutions and compete on a national and global scale. Messaging and product positioning are paramount as many of these organizations may have never worked with a PR pro before and are looking to build visibility for their brand for the first time. It’s important to be aware that you will likely be starting at the ground level. For PR pros looking to break into the Southeast VC community, it all comes down to good old-fashioned networking. The Southeast is made up of tight-knit tech communities that support each other and thrive on two-way collaboration. Dust off those mingling chops and get to know your local tech and VC communities.

Astor: A big opportunity is to attend the wide range of tradeshows that Boston hosts, including the Cloud Foundry Summit, BIO, the Forbes Under 30 Summit and INBOUND, to name a few. The greater Boston area is also home to hubs of the major analyst firms, including Gartner and Forrester. There’s opportunities to network with these analysts who have their eyes on the trends and companies that are important in the local markets. When looking for opportunities to further establish your clients’ brands, our local reporters and influencers know these markets better than anyone and developing relationships with them is critical.

In sum, 2018 is setting up to be an exciting year for investments and growth in the startup industry nationwide. We’ll be keeping a close watch on how things shake out and the ones to watch.

Lisa Astor serves as Senior Vice President & Co-Lead of Client Relations at PAN. In this role, she manages client engagement and strategy across the firm’s technology and healthcare portfolios.
The next chapter: considering your post-sale plans

Serious reflection is in order regarding your plans and future options before signing the dotted line on an agency merger or acquisition.

By Art Stevens

Are you planning to sell your agency sometime soon? Have you thought about where you see yourself four years after the ink dries?

With any public relations agency merger or acquisition, there are numerous questions you must ask yourself before signing on the dotted line, including getting smart about your future options.

For example, are there any distinct landing spots with a clear path to advancement for you in the combined entity? You also may wonder how the merger will affect your agency's overall position in the industry and its reputation, as well as its financial standing.

When I sold my agency after many years in the business, I had a very clear vision about what I wanted to do moving forward: I wanted to give something back to the industry that had been so good to me by providing consulting work and facilitating agency acquisitions. My goal was to remain in the PR space, yet serve it in a new, more pertinent capacity.

Keep your eye on the prize

As someone who's worked closely with more than 100 PR agencies over the last 12 years, I encourage any agency owner to carve out time for some serious reflection about what they want to do with the rest of their life following a sale. I believe it is essential to figure out what is really important to you in life, including why you are working so hard in the first place.

I can personally attest that owning and operating a PR agency can be all consuming. And being thrust into the world outside of your agency life following a sale can often lead to culture shock and disorientation if you are unprepared.

Yes, there's life after agency business

Developing a plan that tackles how you want to monetize your business — and factors in your future ambitions — can yield significant dividends, both financially and personally. Of course, the options and combinations vary from one person to the next.

For instance, if you're hoping to make a second career, you need to think about your future options.

I've met many CEOs who knew from day one of the sales process that they wanted to get out “while the getting's good.” The majority of these owners started the retirement process over the course of the two to three years “burnout” phase following the sale of their agency.

Other executives have different plans they hope to pursue after selling their agency. For example, one head of a firm I sold a few years ago wanted to start a consumer product business with her daughter. Another owner said she'd always dreamed of moving to Israel from New York and eventually followed her path there.

There's also another category of agency sellers: those executives that are in the prime of their lives and want to join forces with an organization that will help them enhance their career, giving them the opportunity to make a quantum leap into a more integral role — on a higher level — within the newly formed entity.

Finally, there's the scenario that I can relate to the most: that it can get very lonely at the top. Some agency owners pursue a merger because they just don't want to work alone anymore (assuming they own 100 percent of the firm).

This circumstance is precisely what happened in my experience as an agency owner. After realizing that I didn't have anyone within my firm on an equal level to make decisions with, I started investigating options to merge with another agency. The rest is history.

Brainstorm your options

There are several things I urge you to consider as you think about your post-sale plans. For starters, learn how to say “no.” Just because you want to step back from the business eventually doesn't mean that your appetite to create and contribute to the world of PR has disappeared altogether.

If anything, your passions may accelerate once you have time to rest and regroup.

In many cases, after an agency sale, industry peers will line up to share new opportunities and partnership ideas, including board of director positions, industry organizations and more.

I also recommend paying it forward. After taking the time you need to rediscover your personal and professional desires, you may find fulfillment serving as an industry advisor or mentor, or dedicating volunteer hours to support peers or non-profit organizations.

For those of you who may be considering retirement, as someone who created a second career more than eight years ago — and still loving it — I urge you to think twice. Some people believe that retirement will allow them the luxury to sit back and smell the roses. However, after some time has passed, I believe those roses don't want to be smelled. In other words, it's important to realize that retirement may not ultimately resolve all of your quality of life issues.

As an alternative, I suggest either starting a second career — as I did — or think about re-engaging and dedicating your time to related activities, with a goal of contributing to the perpetuity of the industry.

Go with the flow, but go for what you want

If you’re in the process of selling your PR agency, you should start to lay the groundwork for your future life now. Be sure to factor in enough time to allow yourself to slow down in stages so that you can try your hand at different things.

Remember, some people have very concrete reasons as to why they’re selling their agency, especially because they have a solid post-sale game plan in place. However, others don’t always have all of the answers.

In my case, after my PR agency was acquired and before I started formally consulting, agency owners almost immediately began reaching out to me for tips and advice. They shared their stories, asked me questions and appreciated my advice. It was at that point that I realized I had something to contribute.

The bottom line: by exploring and pursuing your true interests during any transition period or agency sale, you will allow yourself time to figure out your true passions, helping you to ultimately rediscover the greater world around you and your agency.
5G: are we asking the right questions?

Advances in 5G technologies could alter the very fabric of innovation, yet a significant distance remains between the hype surrounding 5G and the technical, financial and political challenges facing the technology.

The clouds

However, there’s a significant distance between hype and reality around 5G today. As Semiconductor Engineering EIC, Ed Sperling recently wrote, “5G is coming, but not everywhere and not all at once, and not the fastest version of this technology right away.” While the 5G promise is out there and the commitments from giants like Huawei, AT&T, and Verizon are solid evidence that a 5G world will come to pass, there are still several challenges that need to be solved before it becomes a reality.

Technical challenges start with reception issues. 5G signals run at high frequency, which means that trees, shrubs, buildings, cars, even people can disrupt the signal. This leads to the need for a larger physical footprint for base stations, repeaters and small cells to establish reliable access. It also means that the rollout will take a lot longer and require more investment than previous 3G and 4G LTE rollouts.

The need for backward compatibility and the ability to process much more data at faster speeds also requires close collaboration between a variety of segments in the technology industry, from networks to chip makers to device manufacturers.

Even at the device level, 5G technology is still coming into its own. Issues from antenna efficacy to battery drain pose new challenges for device makers. The handoff from older networks to newer ones will have to be seamless, and the 20-plus hour battery life that consumers have come to expect must remain table stakes in the mobile market.

Finally, at the political level, different countries are vying to own 5G in ways that we didn’t see in earlier network evolutions, at least not so publicly. The truth about 5G is its development relies on a global ecosystem of partners. If governments implement protectionist policies to help boost a single country’s advantage in 5G, it’s likely that the exact opposite will happen.

Dreaming about what’s next

The technical, financial and political problems will be solved by different camps. What remains after those solutions are found is the biggest challenge of all: how to reinvent the way we dream. There are better words than “dreaming.” After all, dreaming is something for children and poets, not telcos and Silicon Valley entrepreneurs. Or is it? 5G will change our world: it will bring the IoT, mobility, the auto industry, medicine, education and AI forward in new and fantastic ways. What’s left for people to do is to reimagine what we can invent and how we can apply this to less agnostic challenges we face today. For instance, how will we use 5G technology to solve poverty? How will we use it to improve privacy? Safeguard human rights? Secure IP? Prevent theft? Ensure personal freedoms?

We’re not sure about you, but we don’t read a lot of these issues when we read about 5G. Perhaps that’s really where we’re falling down. Don’t get us wrong, we’re excited about the prospect of downloading a high-def movie in less than a minute, but if we’re truly looking at the horizon of a new technology this big and this far-reaching, shouldn’t we be thinking of solving more than the technical challenges of today?

Finsbury works Takeda’s sweetened bid for Shire

Finsbury is handling Takeda Pharmaceuticals’ fifth bid for rare drug specialist Shire PLC of Dublin.

If successful, the sweetened $60 billion cash/stock offer would mark the largest-ever Japanese acquisition of a western firm and propel Takeda into the top ranks of global drug companies.

Takeda notes the improved bid represents a 58 per cent premium over the closing price of Shire shares on March 23, the day before rumors surfaced about a takeover bid.

It said that completion of the deal would give Shire shareholders “a very meaningful stake in a leading global biopharmaceutical company” and benefits from the synergies flowing from the deal.

Shire is considering Takeda’s latest bid.

Finsbury’s London team of James Murgatroyd Rollo Head and Anjali Unnikrishnan are working the Takeda bid with Kai Goldberg and Chris Ryall in New York.

Do you know who to influence to make your business a leader?

Weiss PR helps companies and organizations reach, engage, and ultimately influence the RIGHT audiences through a combination of proven public relations initiatives and decades of experience — all anchored by strategic communications planning. Start influencing and become a leader today.
How agencies can ride the continuing tech wave

With consumers, products and services transforming at lightning speed, PR professionals must adapt to new ways of addressing audiences as well as understand the brave new world that the tech marketplace has become.

In today’s world, the tech sector encompasses much more than just technology, making it both a daunting challenge and a big opportunity for PR professionals working with tech-based companies and clients. From self-driving cars to currency that only exists in the digital space, technological developments are changing both what consumers buy and the methods they use to buy it. They are also transforming the political and personal arenas, resulting in consumers who are every bit as changed as the products and services they use.

“Activity across a number of areas has fueled tech sector growth,” said Bo Park, who leads the tech, media and telecom practice at ICR. “We’ve seen an explosion of blockchain and cryptocurrency that is still coming into focus, while areas such as food delivery and ‘last-mile’ delivery have matured to the extent that they are spurring sub-sectors supporting them.”

Park also sees the increasing globalization that e-commerce has made possible as a pivotal development in the sector.

But the changed consumer, as well as the changing rules for communicating with that consumer, is also a force to be reckoned with. “Technology is moving from learning to lifestyle,” said W2O Chief Innovation Officer and Vice Chairman Bob Pearson. “In communications, we can speak directly with a brand’s customers and influencers, shaping their ecosystem via new digital techniques, insights-driven analytics, strong listening tools and compelling stories.” As a result, he adds, “there has never been a better time to align the desires of an audience with a brand’s benefits and purpose.”

Helping tech companies tell their stories and make productive connections with audiences requires a more complex understanding of how consumers form opinions and make decisions. “We are moving from a Coverage model (traditional media) to an Influencer model,” Pearson said. “This new model shifts the power of opinion formation to those who are actively engaged in social and digital.”

Because of that, agencies must be able to hit the ground running when it comes to the digital sphere. “No one has time to micromanage or second guess their PR partner,” said Highwire principal Carol Carrubba. According to Carrubba, agencies must work fast to gain the trust of tech partners. “Perhaps because of the complexity of subject matter, the pace of innovation and the extremely competitive market,” she said, “technology clients consistently look for expertise, experience and a sense of personal accountability when picking a PR partner.”

Park also noted the “lightning pace” of the tech sector, and the unique communications practices which that pace makes necessary. “Making these programs effective means firms must bring a deep understanding and 360-degree view of where their clients stand in the corporate lifecycle and what their primary pain points are.”

Park said the level of speed at which the tech market operates means that not only is there a constant level of change in the products and services being offered by clients, there’s also a shifting definition of who is a tech client and who is not. “One of the more remarkable trends that has and will continue to have a major impact on the tech sector is established companies wanting to reinvent themselves as tech companies.”

Heather Kernahan, Hotwire’s President of North America, also sees that process of reinvention at work. “Markets like retail, healthcare and construction — areas that have historically been slower to evolve — are now embracing innovation,” she said.

The widening scope of what it means to be tech company should result in a steady wave of growth for the sector, according to W2O’s Pearson. “Our definition of technology will continue to evolve and drive every industry,” he said. “The tech sector should drive growth for the entire economy.”

So, if the tech sector is entering a solid wave of growth, what are the best methods firms can use to help tech clients get out that message? What are the best channels to use to make that connection with consumers?

“It may be far from an original statement, but any one-size-fits-all standardized approach to communications is rarely a recipe for success,” ICR’s Park said. “With that in mind, there are no best or worst communications channels for tech companies.”

Tailoring the communications channel to the desired audience becomes even more pivotal in a digitally connected world. “If you’re aiming to connect with a ‘deskless’ audience,” she said, “then traditional media may not make sense as your primary communications channel.” On the other hand, she notes that for audiences such as institutional investors, relying on channels like social media is likely not the way to go.

Hotwire’s Kernahan also said that the increasing number of communications channels makes the one size fits all approach increasingly a thing of the past. “Everything is now integrated,” she said, “and it often begins with earned media, which is then supported by paid, shared and owned. The brands seeing the most success understand this and are able to utilize each of these elements to establish authority, extend their reach and educate prospects.”

Pearson said that the increasing complexity and number of channels is throwing attention back on the human factor present in all communication. “The new channel is a network of humans who determine the relevance and importance of your brand.”
Agencies shouldn’t just talk diversity, they should act

PR companies that continue debating the role diversity plays in their organization may ultimately find themselves playing catch up with the rest of the industry.

By Aerial Ellis and Rick Gould

fforts to bolster diversity throughout the PR industry have begun to accelerate.

In February, the Public Relations and Communications Association — Europe’s equivalent to the Public Relations Society of America — launched its Diversity and Inclusion Guidelines.

The guidelines were developed in response to the PRCA’s commitment to improve diversity within the UK industry, after its 2016 PR Censu showed that that the industry is still 91 percent white and 83 percent British.

Agencies are stepping up to the plate as well. London-based Dynamo PR, for example, recently debuted what it calls the PR industry’s first “blind recruitment scheme,” deleting name, education and gender requirements from job applications in a bid to end bias and boost diversity, according to PR Week.

These types of programs must proliferate. The future of the PR profession depends on it. Just take a look at U.S. population projections, per the Pew Research Center, showing profound changes in the country’s demographics.

The time for chatter regarding diversity is past, and companies that continue to debate diversity may ultimately find themselves playing catch up.

The Ketchum-Fast Company survey of 500 creative professionals released last summer uncovered an important dichotomy: Respondents believe diversity of thought is valued by their organization (72 percent), yet an overwhelming majority think their organization still needs to do more to encourage diversity of ideas (85 percent).

In order to truly build a more diverse industry, PR firm owners and C-level executives must get out of their comfort zone, which tends to hover near Caucasians with degrees in PR, marketing or communications.

Rather, PR managers and C-level executives have to create their own bridges to encourage blacks, Latinos, and Asians to join the industry; and not just people possessing PR and media savvy but folks who are adroit at videographer, digital analytics, paid media and other skill sets that are becoming core to PR services.

Diversity, of course, is good for business, and helps to create new revenue opportunities that might not otherwise be available.

However, in order to create those opportunities, PR agencies must commit to providing the resources to ensure diversity is baked into the firm’s business operation, from hiring to retention to promotion.

With that in mind, here are three ways PR firm owners and C-level execs can make diversity part of the company’s overall business strategy. Stick-to-itiveness is key.

Budget for training programs

PR pros rarely receive the education needed to navigate the issues related to diversity and inclusion. PR firm owners must budget for training, whether in-house or outsourcing. Before starting any diversity training initiative PR firm owners and C-level execs must decide how they are going to measure the program(s). The goal of these programs is so agencies learn the cultural nuances of audiences and employees who come from nontraditional back-grounds and bring a different frame of reference to the table. PR firms have made adequate investments in time and money so that all their employees understand the historical, theoretical and societal issues related to diversity and inclusion. Resources are available via the PRSA, Institute of Public Relations, PR Council and The Plank Center for Public Relations, among others.

Recruit with a multicultural mindset

As demand for more diverse firms grows among clients and prospects, firm owners must create an inclusive work environment that attracts, develops and retains talent from diverse backgrounds. It’s crucial that PR firms and corporate communications departments reflect the audiences and communities they serve. To ensure a more diverse pipeline of talent, agency owners should connect with historically black colleges and universities as well as schools with emerging-majority populations.

Firms can align with these institutions via sponsorships and/or participation in student-focused events, for example. Diversity and inclusion is much more effective when PR firm owners recognize the value of multicultural employees; go beyond stereotypes of race, age and gender; and avoid putting a person in a box based on his or her identity.

Partner with diversity advocates

Senior PR execs must actively build partnerships that promote a deeper understanding between the PR industry and diverse publics. In order to tap into the needs of a multicultural consumer base, C-level execs must align with membership organizations that serve specific cultural groups and advocate for diversity. These groups include chambers of commerce, Small Business Development Centers and civic organizations. PR firm owners can help to create networks of colleagues from various backgrounds, scout smaller minority-owned agencies to assist with projects, and ask for referrals among these various groups.

Agency leaders also can host client roundtables periodically as a way to cultivate diverse partnerships, build new alliances and share what’s working (and what’s not).

Of course, there are other types of diversity initiatives. Much depends on the firm’s culture and the level of resources allotted. The larger takeaway is that owners must start to put these programs in place and let them evolve. Otherwise, buyers will start to look upon PR firms as antiquated.

Volatile markets, social purpose test financial firms

Financial PR firms faced a watershed year in 2017 as clients were impacted by extreme market volatility, corporate tax cuts, threatened trade war with China, cyber-threats, increased stakeholder activism, deregulation and the growing demand to highlight corporate social responsibility.

By Kevin McCauley

President Trump’s willingness to use his Twitter platform to criticize individual companies added another challenge for financial PR firms. Amazon, for instance, lost billions in market valuation following a Presidential tweet storm.

Richard Dukas, Chief of Dukas Linden Public Relations, told O’Dwyer’s his firm put a strong focus on financial broadcast news to help clients gain visibility in a media landscape increasingly crowded by 24/7 Trump reports.

The New York-based firm, which generated $5.2 million in financial fee income, arranged guest hosting segments for clients on business programs such as CNBC’s “Squawk Box” and “ Closing Bell,” Fox Business Network’s “Mornings with Maria” and PBS’ “Nightly Business Report.”

During 2017, DLPR got more than 600 broadcast interviews for clients, primarily on CNBC, Bloomberg and Fox.

Dukas said his firm’s knowledge of investment trends also drove market-moving media placements.

At a time of investor activism, DLPR showcased campaigns by activist short-sellers Muddy Waters Research and Spruce Point to uncover corporate wrongdoing.

The firm presented Okapi Partners, a top proxy solicitor for companies and investors, in activist situations.

As the financial world continues to debate “passive versus active” investment strategies, DLPR raised the visibility of ETF investors such as Global X Funds and ARK Invest.

Looking ahead, Dukas said renewed equity market volatility may increase investment in non-correlated assets such as real estate, private equity and hedge funds, causing alternative investment firms to seek PR assistance.

He noted that financial services firms are showing more interest in digital communications, although they remain cautious about using tools such as LinkedIn, HubSpot, Twitter, etc. due to compliance issues.

Crisis communications will take center stage, as companies seek to develop “what if” plans to address cyber-threats, #MeToo issues, regulatory shifts and volatile markets.

“Given the information overload from social media, tweets, blogs and 24/7 news, management must do a better job of positioning — with clear and compelling messages that convey a company’s distinctive value proposition,” Dukas said. “In this context, DLPR believes earned media remains a highly influential and effective channel and should have a prominent role alongside the newer trend of ‘content creation’ campaigns.”

Developing social purpose

Corporate boards will look back on 2017 as a time when managing reputational risk became significantly more challenging, said Bill McBride, Senior Advisor at RF|Binder Partners, which registered $4.6 million in financial fees.

“After spending 2017 dodging Presidential Twitter darts, corporate boards entered 2018 with a warning from the biggest global asset managers — the titans of index investing — to expect more intense scrutiny of the social impact of their business models,” said McBride. “Adding to the pressure was new research refining the concepts of the ‘materiality’ of environment, social, and governance factors in corporate performance, tightening the connection between social impact and company valuations.”

He noted that the shooting at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School thrust weapon manufacturers, retailers, logistics companies and financial service companies into the center of a public debate on gun violence, one of society’s most contentious issues.

“In the wake of Stoneman, the surge of such Twitter hashtags as ‘#BoycottDelta’ or “BoycottNRA” underscored how quickly public opinion forms and surges — and also can fade — in the era of social media,” said McBride. “This volatility can have significant effects on the perceptions and behavior of customers, employees, shareholders, distributors, regulators and the legal community.”

Data from RF|Binder’s whitepaper, “Navigating Risk in the Age of Corporate Purpose,” shows that boards will not easily sidestep the public’s increasing tendency to see corporate behavior through the lens of social impact.

More than three quarters of respondents said they either “strongly support” or “somewhat support” companies taking a stance on increased access to health care or on environmental sustainability.

Seventy percent “strongly support” or “somewhat support” companies that adopt a position on gender equality.

“In this volatile, fractious communications environment, corporate clients are coming to understand the importance of developing ‘purpose’ as the touchstone for all their internal and external relationships,” said McBride. “Successful companies in this new era of hyper-connectivity will be those who develop an authentic, purpose-driven approach to communicating the value of their organization.”

Consider entire value chain

Luke Lambert, CEO of G&S Business Communications, said his firm’s approach to financial communications is based on a modern definition of business value as measured by the three R’s: Reputation, Risk and Return.

The goal is to add greater dimensions to client strategies by providing data-driven insights that differentiate a company’s financial performance or investments.

“In today’s hyper-connected, hyper-competitive marketplace, our goal is to identify meaningful advantages for clients by considering their entire value chain,” said Lambert. “Because our agency’s business communicators bring in-depth knowledge...

Healthcare PR thrives amid historic disruption

Shifts in the policy and technological landscapes have ushered in big changes and bigger challenges for communicators working in today’s healthcare sector.

By Jon Gingerich

Healthcare is a multi-trillion-dollar industry. The organizations and companies inside this ecosystem are invested in solving some of the world’s most complex issues, and this landscape is being upended by historic changes, among them myriad policy and technological developments affecting the industry both externally and internally.

Coinciding with this disruption is the notion that today’s healthcare industry is also breaking down virtually every silo we’ve known. Healthcare clients want to leave a legacy of meaningful change; they demand unique experiences from communications pros who understand today’s commercial, healthcare, public policy and patient advocacy environments and can help them solve complex challenges while delivering results they can’t find at other agencies.

In the middle of this are the 68 firms boasting major healthcare operations in O’Dwyer’s 2018 rankings of PR firms, all of whom have undoubtedly learned that innovation and integration are paramount for success in this competitive, constantly changing environment.

Global health consultancy and communications agency Health Unlimited was ranked #4 in healthcare by O’Dwyer’s, taking in nearly $26 million in healthcare-related net fees in 2017.

Health Unlimited was founded when U.S. agencies Cooney Waters Unlimited and Corkery Group Unlimited, as well as UK consultancies Red Door Unlimited, Rock Unlimited, Loooped Unlimited, DIM-PAN Unlimited and Search Unlimited, formally united in a bid to deliver a wide array of client solutions across varying health-related disciplines.

Global CEO Timothy Bird said clients have more choice nowadays, and as a result, the healthcare PR industry needs to compete harder for new clients and work more diligently for existing ones. More and more of today’s clients want a full-service agency under one roof and one P&L that provides efficiencies beyond the mere financial benefits; they want teams with nuanced perspectives and multi-disciplinary experience they can rely on to deliver results and succeed.

“Talent engagement, retention and recruitment remains key,” Bird said. “Our success depends not just on our ability to recruit experienced healthcare specialists from diverse backgrounds in science, medicine, law, and public health but also inclusive of the audiences we and our clients seek to reach with health messages — people from differing cultural and ethnic backgrounds and experiences who bring perspectives, fresh new thinking and creative ideas.”

Already, the newly-minted agency has signed a portfolio of new clients, including opioid addiction treatment specialist Indivior, Sickle Cell Disease therapeutics company Global Blood Therapeutics, women’s reproductive research and policy organization Guttmacher Institute and autism research specialist SPARK.

Bird said client satisfaction remains high because the agency makes it easy for them to get an agile PR-led team of specialists who can demonstrate ROI and deliver results vital to improving and saving lives.

“It is a key focus for us as a health-specialist agency,” Bird said. “Our clients cannot continue to make investments in delivering new treatments, improvements to existing approaches and public health interventions without seeing measurable improvements in health outcomes. We take that responsibility very seriously.”

Spectrum, the D.C.-based health, life sciences and consumer PR firm, accounted for $24 million in healthcare-related net fees in 2017, ranking #5 for healthcare PR in O’Dwyer’s rankings this year.

Spectrum President and CEO Jonathan Wilson told O’Dwyer’s that a crucial part of the agency’s strategic growth comes down to its staff, and fostering an environment that inspires employees to make a difference in the lives of patients and caregivers while meeting the needs of its health and science clients.

“This philosophy has attracted a team of experienced, passionate and focused communications leaders who, in turn, inspire all our teams to champion client needs,” Wilson said. “Combined with the flexibility of being independent and our integrated model, teams are empowered to focus on exceeding expectations in their work to improve the health landscape.”

Wilson also noted that while “innovation” has become a buzzword, there’s no denying it’s needed in every facet of today’s healthcare industry.

“While a perceived inertia amongst industry outsiders has driven them to try accelerating healthcare innovation, ultimately, the industry still plays a large role in driving progress in all areas from drug development to caregiver support,” Wilson said.

“Keep innovation coming, pharma needs to look both within and to external players in order to inspire continuous, meaningful innovation — and, as health communicators, it’s part of our job to assist.”

Healthcare specialist Jarrard Phillips Cate & Hancock, Inc. accounted for $9.8 million in healthcare net fees in 2017, ranking #9 in O’Dwyer’s rankings of healthcare PR firms this year.

David Jarrard, President and CEO of the Nashville-based agency, believes healthcare will continue to outpace many other communications sectors this year and beyond as the healthcare landscape is roiled by internal change as well as a new breed of external competitors such as Amazon, CVS and WalMart.

Jarrard also believes that PR agencies known for their strong data analytics will prove highly competitive in the coming year.

"In the big picture, the ongoing convergence of siloed communication practices — public relations, marketing, content management — will continue to reshape the expectations of our clients and, ultimately, our industry," Jarrett told ODwyer’s.

Healthcare agency Lazar Partners was #15 this year, boasting nearly $5.4 million in healthcare-related net fees.

Founder and CEO Fern Lazar said the agency experienced growth from all healthcare segments last year, and the New York-based shop’s expertise in medical technology, scientific communications and patient-to-patient communications were what especially drove the bulk of its revenue in 2017.

about heavily regulated industries, such as agriculture and food, clean energy and financial services, corporate clients also rely on us to advise their strategic investment units.

"These investment arms of global companies are uncovering some of the most exciting growth opportunities, many in emerging business areas that seek to solve the world’s toughest challenges, such as food security and climate change.

“Our guidance and programs support these portfolio companies as they achieve scale, seek new routes to market, or encounter pressure from competitors, regulators, legislators or suppliers,” said Lambert.

G&S, which had $1.2 million in financial income, counsels corporate issuers on how to provide a more complete picture of their material value to shareholders. “Our sustainability experts and analysts work closely with CFOs and CCOs to develop integrated financial reports that disclose risk and returns in terms of environmental, social and governance factors,” said Lambert. “Lack of transparency will be no longer tolerated as major investment companies and fund managers call for specific reforms — among them workforce diversity, pay parity and social responsibility — that drive long-term value and uphold the social license to operate.”

Strengthening social capabilities

Martin Mosbacher, CEO of Intermarket, said his firm used 2017 to evolve from its focus on the intersection of finance and technology.

“After a few sluggish years, Intermarket, rebounded last year with the addition of Overstock.com’s tZero unit, blockchain/crypto-currency, BioCatch (cybersecurity) and Aperion Investment Partners (London-based venture capital group).

On the more traditional front, Intermarket, which generated 2017 financial fees of $4 million, began work with AST (shareholder ownership services provider) and New Frontier Advisors (institutional research and investment advisory firm).

Intermarket renewed ties with NASDAQ, expanded business with RBC Wealth Management and formalized a longstanding relationship with the University of Chicago Booth School of Business as the school’s PR agency.

In addition to client work, Intermarket placed a new emphasis on expanding its content development and social media teams,” said Mosbacher. “Utilizing the PESO model we are able to provide our clients with 360 degree communications advice, strategy development and service.”

He said the firm is “developing new modes of content development and placement and expecting to make some significant additions to our client roster and capacity in 2018.”

Intermarket chalked up $4.1 million in financial income.

Counterfactual fake news

Peppercomm worked with the Institute for Public Relations in 2017 to study the challenges faced by CCOs and CMOs in the business work, said Jacqueline Kolek, Managing Director of the firm with $7.1 million in financial income.

The first study found respondents were concerned about the uncertainty of the Trump Administration’s communications policies and were increasing efforts to be better prepared to respond (or not respond) if the Administration does something that affects their organization.

Kolek said the second study dealt with how communicators were reacting to the rapid evolution of digital and data and found that while most agreed that implementing digital and data is critical to their success, they are struggling with how to describe and deploy these technologies.

She said Peppercomm’s 2018 priorities include helping clients prepare for and navigate potential issues and crisis situations in today’s highly-politicized, fake news environment and to communicate their corporate purpose to align themselves with organizations that share their values.

Why subscription-based news is the future

A growing distrust in clickbait headlines and the corrosive atmosphere of fake news is sending the public fleeing digital news sources and returning to subscription-based media properties that offer quality reporting and great storytelling.

By Todd Barrish

D espite what you may have heard about the “failing New York Times,” the newspaper had a bang-up year in 2017. Digital-only subscriptions to the Times jumped 46 percent in 2017 and overall subscription revenue eclipsed $1 billion for the year. In fiscal 2017, meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal added 300,000 digital subscriptions.

On the other hand, we've seen the public perception of some newer media properties slide. A University of Missouri survey of consumers last year found that Occupy Democrats, BuzzFeed and Breitbart were the least-trusted news sources. A top the list of the most-trusted was The Economist, whose subscriptions rose 30.8 percent in 2015. The Economist is on a mission to double its circulation profits by 2020.

What we're seeing is a flight to quality. Facebook's latest “friends and family” algorithm tweak has toned down the effect of clickbait headlines. Though there's still a market for such fare on Google News, Google itself has recently announced a $300 million commitment to support quality news outlets. That initiative includes Subscribe With Google, a feature that will let readers subscribe to news sources via their Google accounts. Welcome back to the age of subscription-based news.

Back to the future

The earliest American newspapers were subscription based because they were outgrowths of political parties. But mass printing technology after the Civil War prompted the rise of cheap newspapers distributed in the cash-and-carry method by paper boys.

In this environment, the most sensationalistic headlines sold the most papers. Truth was irrelevant, because the idea was to win the day's sales. Such yellow journalism led to the Spanish American War. In the 1890s, the Adolph Ochs-led New York Times countered the spread of yellow journalism by promoting his paper as the opposite: a sober publication that emphasized truth over sensationalism.

Sound familiar? The digital equivalent of shouting newsboys is the flurry of clickbait headlines on Facebook and Google. But now Facebook has choked off the supply and Google is at least taking steps to weed out fake news and promote the idea of subscriptions rather than impression-based news sources.

Great story, but is it true?

Once again, our news sources appear to be party-run, if not in name then in spirit. Democrats don't trust Fox News and Republicans don't trust MSNBC. In truth, most of us understand that both outfits tend to present a biased interpretation of events rather than objectivity.

One offshoot of the fake news crisis is that there's more skepticism for unknown news brands. While the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal make mistakes, people tend to realize that stories from both are much more likely to be true. But people are now less willing to give the benefit of the doubt to stories from news organizations they don't recognize. In 2015, you might have seen a headline in your news feed from an obscure source and thought "great story." In 2018, the default is "Great story. But is it true?"

We're wiser than we were a few years ago. Most of us no longer take any web-based news at face value unless it's attached to a brand we trust. This, of course, tilts the advantage to incumbents, but newcomers can make their mark with accurate reporting and great storytelling that's uninfluenced by click-through and share rates. The good news is that we're working towards a baseline of truth that will curtail the corrosive atmosphere of fake news. The bad news is, if you want that truth, you're going to have to pay for it.

Tech roundup

and its story,” he said. “If you know which humans matter for a brand, you can figure out the rest.”

And, as is the case with all human interaction, the level of trust is of ever-growing importance in developing relations between companies and clients. “It is imperative that the agency wins the confidence of the tech client by always bringing new ideas, having a back-up plan to the back-up plan and delivering results,” Highwire’s Carrubba said.

With the bad rap that digital communications are getting in the wake of the controversies surrounding Facebook, Google and Cambridge Analytica, ensuring the security of information, as well as trust, is a must for firms looking to work with clients in the tech sector.

But Pearson believes that the current controversies may also point the way to positive new strategies. “We believe the recent Facebook questions relate to a larger trend,” he said. “Data is on a path to freedom. As we become stewards of our own ‘me-nome,’ we will be able to aggregate the variety of data streams that we all create during an average day from our bodies, cars, phones, devices and more. It is time for personal clouds to have their place in society.”

Park sees the importance of trust as just one of the forces shaping the future of the tech space and the role PR can play in that space. "Looking ahead," she said, "there are a few trends that will be interesting to watch — such as digital advertising’s quest for accountability and the impact that process will have on the space. Additionally, tech companies’ approaches to raising capital appear to be evolving."

What will almost certainly remain the same, however, is the need for firms to conceive of communications that anticipate the desires of audiences, as well as the crises that can affect any company, regardless of its relationship to technology.

Carrubba said that “in an era of record funding for tech startups and digital transformation mandates from enterprises; where blockchain, AI and autonomous mobility suddenly seem to be everywhere and where new leaders emerge in years not decades, smart communications programs can help to establish leadership and progress an agenda.”

Integrated strategies boost PR’s profile, bottom line

A 24/7 content cycle and an increasingly digital, increasingly segmented media landscape has led to a rapid integration of marketing and PR efforts across a convergence of paid, earned and owned channels that will continue to bring new opportunities for the communications industry. Gone are the days of the traditional PR firm; PR pros have realized they’re storytellers first and foremost, armed with a suite of multi-channel services and strategies to engage audiences and mobilize them to act.

The PR industry has entered a new era. Case in point: The top independent PR firms ranked by O’Dwyer’s this year accounted for a combined total of more than $3.14 billion in net fees, more than double the $1.4 billion recorded by this magazine a year ago. Number-one PR giant Edelman, with its 2017 earnings of nearly $894 million, is on track to break the billion-dollar mark within the next few years.

CEO Richard Edelman said business at his firm was slow during the first half of 2017, but picked up as the year progressed. He noted that Edelman had outperformed the big agency networks, but refused to accept single-digit growth as the “new normal,” saying the independent shop must battle ad agencies and digital outfits for market share.

Top 10 tops expectations

Every one of the top-ten firms in O’Dwyer’s rankings this year saw gains, compared to eight in our rankings last year. Twenty-one of the top 25 firms were up in billings in 2017, with 11 revealing double-digit growth. Of the 124 PR agencies participating in the O’Dwyer’s rankings in 2018, 92 of them — or 74 percent — posted year-over-year gains.

Tech-focused independent network W2O Group took O’Dwyer’s #2 slot, accounting for $144 million in net fees in 2017, up 17.6 percent from 2016’s $123 million, adding another banner year on top of the San Francisco-based marketing and communications network’s 33 percent climb in 2017.

W2O Vice Chair and Chief Innovation Officer Bob Pearson cited the agency’s ability to scale offerings, team talent and innovation concurrently as one cause for the firm’s success.

“We expect a client leader to understand all forms of media and deliver what is required, not what is available. This approach is resulting in more opportunities, bigger and bolder ideas and attracting clients who want to make a major difference for their customers. The revenue numbers are simply the result,” Pearson told O’Dwyer’s.

Advances in technology and data science will influence the evolution of virtually every model of communications and marketing in the not-too-distant future, Pearson said. And he predicted that we’ll see an emergence of search media relations and media plans that encompass earned, shared, owned and paid channels, usually in that order. Pearson specifically cited two key drivers that he sees as responsible for moving the industry forward in 2018 and beyond: technology and common sense.

“From a technology standpoint, machine learning is arguably the most important advancement in how we measure, learn and build mechanisms to create campaigns that matter and then retain that knowledge for the next campaign,” Pearson said. “Common sense occurs when great client service leaders realize that a strong earned and shared strategy can impact the paid media plan or a media relations professional knows who the top influencers are for each square inch of the 1,990 model. New media models are enabling us to focus on what is relevant, create a wider offering of what is possible and remain agile enough to change based on the needs of our customers. That is pretty cool.”

Washington D.C.-based PR and public affairs giant APCO Worldwide was #3 this year, topping $128 million in net fees, accounting for gains of 6.3 percent from 2016’s $120.6 million.

“2017 was a year of tremendous growth and progress for APCO,” said APCO Global President Evan Kraus. “Our growth was fueled by a commitment to our own independence that has given us an ability to reinvest in our people like never before. We’ve started and expanded exciting work helping C-Suite leaders deal with disruption and world leaders make their global mark. We entered 2018 more excited than ever about the future, and look forward to continuing this progress in the years ahead.”

Finn Partners is up six percent, from $76.7 million in 2016 to just under $81.3 last year, taking the fourth position in O’Dwyer’s 2017 rankings.

Founding Managing Partner Peter Finn said that healthcare and tech were two practice areas where the global independent agency saw particularly strong gains. The agency also benefitted from a combination of recent acquisitions as well as organic growth from new accounts and expanding existing client relationships, trends that have continued into 2018.

“This year has started off fantastically well for us. It’s the best first quarter we’ve ever had, with lots of big wins with new clients as well as with existing clients,” Finn said.

Finn also said the agency has several pending acquisitions in the pipeline that it plans to announce later in the year.

Finn cited a fundamental cultural divide between independent PR firms and the shops owned by multinational conglomer-
Financial communications and investor relations mainstay ICR was #5 this year, gaining an impressive 13.9 percent from 2016’s $55.6 million to $63.4 million.

CEO Thomas Ryan told O’Dwyer’s the firm won more than 100 new retainer clients and performed communications work for 27 IPOs last year, compared to nine in 2016. The firm’s digital/social media group also outperformed nicely, as did its special situations comms. team. Finally, ICR ended 2017 with 176 team members, a seven percent increase from 2016. Client revenues were also up 30 percent.

Ryan told O’Dwyer’s that the agency expects to see more of the same in 2018, and particularly anticipates growth in the agency’s technology, retail, real estate and healthy living industry groups.

“The role of PR continues to rise in importance and increasingly, the mishandling of stakeholder communications results in reputational and valuation damage,” Ryan said. “As far as by product, we expect to make strides in digital media, crisis communications, general business and financial media advice and strategic investor relations.”

Financial firm Prosek Partners moved from #7 to the #6 slot this year, charting growth of 33.2 percent to nearly $41 million, the largest gaining firm in O’Dwyer’s top 10.

Managing Partner Jen Prosek cited sea changes in the U.S. financial sector, as well as growth in the agency’s special situations, crisis and transactions business, as factors contributing to the agency’s impressive double-digit growth.

“The financial sector is an emerging market for marketing. There are firms we represent who have just recently decided — for the first time — to allocate serious marketing dollars to communications and brand,” Prosek said. “Additionally, there is more demand for holistic marketing solutions — paid, earned and owned — among our target client base, in which Prosek can offer both marketing and communications solutions.”

Prosek predicted that the industry will see AI and analytics make communications more powerful, targeted and measurable. She also believes that Generation Z and Millennials will continue to have a huge impact on the expectations of how senior management communicates internally and externally on social issues, a movement that she believes will peak this year. Finally, she noted that a continued erosion of trust and a media environment rife with fake news would result in an increased reliance on communications firms as trusted advisors.

Padilla ended 2017 only slightly — 1.5 percent — above 2016, the result of the turnover of a major client as well as slow starts to much of the new business the agency acquired last year, according to Chair and CEO Lynn Casey.

The Minneapolis-headquartered agency, which also owns food and nutrition consulting division FoodMinds, was #7 this year, at $40 million. Casey said all of that new business is now in full-swing, and the agency has already more than made up for its 2017 lull during the year’s first quarter.

Casey said she expects the industry to lean into earned influence even more than ever, as well as taking advantage of the disintegrating boundaries between paid, earned, shared and owned disciplines.

“There is some business optimism emerging despite the geo-political uncertainty of the past 18 months. Digital engagement heavy with visual content is exploding for those firms equipped to do great work in this arena for clients. We are learning better how to compete with ad agencies, digital agencies and others for this work, and are driving more integrated programs versus tucking our ‘traditional’ competencies into a program that others have created,” Casey said. “It’s an exciting time to be in this business!”

Tech PR specialist Hotwire continues to rise up in O’Dwyer’s annual rankings, gaining 4.9 percent in 2017 to take the #8 position this year with $33.2 million in net fees.

Hotwire North America President Heather Kernahan told O’Dwyer’s that the agency, a subsidiary of Australia-based marketing network Enero Group Limited, has innovated within the last year by evolving its business model, expanding into new geographies with pop-up offices in Minneapolis and Mexico and rebranding to better serve clients and showcase its qualities as a challenger brand.

“As an agency, if you stand still you fall behind. We grow by innovating and by working with innovation companies. We’ve seen more non-tech companies realizing the value of being innovation brands and turning to Hotwire to help them tell the story of their business. This innovation positioning helps them hire, increase their valuation and to continue being relevant in their competitive industries.”

Parsippany, NJ-based Coyne Public Relations rounded out 2017 with a 2.6 percent gain to $28 million, taking the #9 spot in O’Dwyer’s 2018 rankings.

ranking this year.

CEO Thomas Coyne attributed the agency’s growth to the hard work and attitude of the Coyne team. He predicts the industry will witness expanded business opportunities across industry sectors this year with a noted emphasis on media and influencers playing a critical role in delivering information. Other trends driving the industry include privacy and disclosure, an expansion of the marketing of American-made products and CSR efforts surrounding the fair and equal treatment of all citizens.

“The industry has had some very exciting growth in recent years due to the expansion into paid and owned opportunities,” Coyne said. “In the next year, I see the ‘other services’ normalizing following some of the fast expansion into digital marketing as it evolves from a specialty to a service. PR’s role will continue to expand into social media and traditional media as clients look for guidance about how to best tell brand enhancing stories and cultivate an appropriate connection to the ‘right’ influencers.”

New York’s 5WPR broke into O’Dwyer’s top 10 for the first time this year, ranking 13 percent in 2017 to $27.5 million from 2016’s $24.3 million.

5W President and CEO Ronn Torossian said integration is key to PR’s future success, citing the industry’s ability to further implement creative strategies and storytelling through earned, owned and paid channels, crafting “a cohesive narrative that connects with the consumer and evokes emotion.”

“5W is continually growing and innovating as the media landscape changes every day. We’ve significantly expanded our digital team which includes seasoned experts from big-name companies across the media industry,” Torossian said. “In addition to our ability to adapt to the needs of our clients, we offer full-service PR and marketing capabilities across consumer, corporate and technology divisions. This is a key strength of 5W’s, and a big reason why brands come to us for their PR efforts.”

PR specialties see leaps and bounds

O’Dwyer’s ranks firms by 12 PR specialties. Technology and healthcare PR remained the most popular specialties this year, ranking 69 and 68 firms, respectively. Edelman topped both of these lists with $157.3 million in healthcare PR fees and $259.8 million in technology. W2O Group was #2 in healthcare at $124.2 million, followed by APCO Worldwide at $27.5 million. Hotwire ($33.2 million) and Finn Partners ($26.4 million) rounded out the top three technology PR firms.

Edelman dominated the rest of the specialties, including beauty and fashion (28 firms), entertainment (30 firms), financial (45 firms), food and beverage (47 firms), home furnishings (27 firms), professional services (53 firms) and travel & economic development (43 firms).

Edging out Edelman for agriculture PR is New York’s G&S Business Communications with $17.4 million in net fees to Edelman’s $14.1 million.

APCO Worldwide took the top spot for environmental PR & PA with $37 million in net fees to Edelman’s $17 million. Davies came in at a close third with $10.4 million.

Taylor is #1 for sports PR with $9.6 million in net fees, followed by French | West | Vaughan at $5.7 million, Coyne at $2.8 million and Edelman at $1.6 million.

Underscoring the strength of specialties this year was the performance of Fahlgren Mortine, which ranked #12, up 10.4 percent in 2017 to nearly $27 million compared to 2016’s $24.4 million.

The Columbus, OH-based agency, which owns New York-based travel subsidiary Turner, also increased profit by 35 percent, added 50 new clients to its roster and grew its B2B business 10 percent in 2017. In total, those new business efforts yielded a 200 percent year-over-year increase in new revenue, not counting organic client growth in spending.

President Neil Mortine said deep category experience and expertise was a factor behind much of this growth, as well as integrated viewpoints on the marketing and communications challenges presented to the agency and a dynamic staff that competes fiercely on behalf of its clients.

Mortine cited a series of digital challenges facing the industry in the coming year, including how to effectively use PR as a vehicle for SEO (particularly with mobile), how to use hyper-targeting and micro influencers in an increasingly segmented media landscape, how to metricize PR/earned media that informs bottom-line business insight, and how to produce engaging content at a higher volume at a fraction of the cost.

“In the modern age of marketing, the role of PR is evolving, and understanding of its value is being elevated. Our challenge is to embrace and foster PR’s role in an increasingly digital world,” Mortine said.

Healthcare and life sciences shop Spectrum had another great year in 2017, surging 20 percent to the #16 spot with $24 million in net fees. The gains follow a similarly spectacular 2016, when the Washington, D.C.-based agency projected 34.8 percent growth with $20 million in net fees. It’s the agency’s third consecutive year of double-digit revenue growth, with a significant portion of those gains attributed to organic activity.

Spectrum President and CEO Jonathan Wilson said this transformative growth is part of a larger trend over the past four years to create a forward-looking agency structured to meet clients’ future needs, now organized into practice areas, fully-integrated teams and a dedicated focus on building an extraordinary agency culture.

“With clients starting to ask for real-time, comprehensive strategies, we’re seeing being ahead of the curve in our model start to pay off,” Wilson said.

Wilson also cited a “responsive, insights-first strategy” as a requirement for successful communications programs of the future.

“What we’re seeing in market today is based on the landscape of that moment, but most are not designed to be nimble or responsive as conversations evolve. In order to engage and drive value, clients and agencies alike are realizing that programs must adapt in real-time to reflect what’s happening,” Wilson said. “We use our marketing intelligence platform, Galileo6, to focus on media relevance. This provides the unique
President and CEO Philip Nardone, Jr. attributed two key factors to the agency’s performance this year. The first was the agency’s ability to provide truly integrated services and combine them with a sophisticated measurement platform. The second was having a well-organized HR team dedicated to attracting top talent. PAN hired 65 new staffers in 2017 across its four offices, a 45 percent year-over-year increase, which Nardone said allowed the agency to meet customers’ integrated marketing demands and produced results that contributed to its overall growth.

“The industry’s continued digital transformation means PR is no longer a standalone field,” Nardone said. “The remainder of 2018 will focus on the further integration of marketing and PR efforts, honing in on influencer marketing and voice of the customer as drivers of brand awareness and building customer connections. Brands will learn to lean on agencies to implement influencer marketing programs and showcase how these relationships will position them as industry leaders. Agencies will respond by tuning in to customer feedback and preferences by establishing voice of the customer programs to enhance their relationships. This is where we’ll see growth in the use of data and analytics to prove ROI of these trends, which will quickly become a commonplace for PR and marketing professionals.”

B2B technology PR specialist InkHouse grew by 13 percent in 2017 to $16.2 million, ranking #27 this year.

CEO Beth Monaghan highlighted several contributing factors to the Waltham, MA-based agency’s success, namely, a focus on growing responsibly as opposed to growing fast. This entails working with admired companies and attracting talent with diverse backgrounds and areas of expertise. Sometimes it might also mean turning down prospective business.

“Growth is one of those good challenges, and it’s all about developing an openness and comfort with constant change,” said Monaghan. “In the last year, it meant that we got to a size where I had to rewrite our company values and think about ways to infuse our values into our culture better. Tomorrow, it might be a better way to track our time.”

“We are in a time of tumult when trust is at stake for every organization in America. We have fake news to go with our alternative facts and the pressure for clear communications from trusted spokespeople is intense,” Monaghan continued. “A byproduct of this environment is the re-insertion of businesses into the discourse on political, environmental and social good. We call this evolution of CSR ‘purpose-driven PR’ because times have changed, and communications strategies must too.”

Annapolis, MD-based Crosby, which specializes in marketing programs for healthcare, government and nonprofits, grew an impressive 23.8 percent in the last year to $15.1 million, following the 21 percent growth the agency experienced in 2016.

Crosby President and CEO Raymond Crosby listed several factors that contributed to the agency’s multi-year, double-digit growth wave, including a selective client retention history and a strong focus on serving healthcare and nonprofit clients, as well as engaging the military and veteran community. Crosby also cited digital transformation and social media as being big drivers of growth, as well as a concerted effort to continue building out the agency’s in-house video and multimedia facilities and further accelerate its content creation and distribution capabilities.

Crosby also identified three factors that will particularly matter as the industry turns to the future: creativity, integration and integrity.

“Creativity because it’s easy to get lost in the march toward algorithms, analytics and artificial intelligence,” Crosby said. “Ideas and experiences are still at the heart of making human connections and moving people to action. Integration because you have to be able to deal with the never-ending complexity of audiences, media channels, content and digital transformation. It’s all so interconnected that siloed approaches come up short. Earned media, while still incredibly valuable, will get harder and harder to come by. Reliance on shared, paid and owned channels will only increase. Integrity because everyone in the ecosystem (clients, agencies, media partners) needs to be held to a higher standard in an era of withering corporate ethics, fake news, and paid influencers. The communications industry can be a leader instead of a pawn in this game.”

“Integration, integration, integration” San Jose-based tech shop The Hoffman Agency was #32 this year, up 12.2 percent to $12.7 million.

CEO Lou Hoffman listed investments the agency made into being good shepherds of its brand as well as the ability to win and service multi-country clients across multiple markets as factors that drove the agency’s growth.

Hoffman also said the agency’s proprietary methodology for storytelling was an effort that delivered positive results. Every agency under the sun touts storytelling these days, but Hoffman said the inconvenient reality is that storytelling, by the conventional definition, often can’t be applied in business communications.

“Can you imagine a company executive responding to each question from a journalist with a story that has a start, an end and something going astray in between? Our approach around storytelling techniques solves this issue, particularly for B2B clients which is our sweet spot. Many agencies talk about being a digital-first agency. I think of us as a narrative-first agency. Content is at the core of what we do.”

Like everyone else, Hoffman sees an increasing amount of PR work migrating toward digital and integrated campaigns that bring together earned, paid and owned media. Hoffman said he’s also beginning to see communication agencies increasingly implementing more B2B campaigns with a direct tie to sales lead generation. Communicators of all stripes are beginning to realize that content is at the foundation of marketing efforts, not just PR.

Miami-based marketing PR firm rbb Communications shot up 23.5 percent in 2017 to $11.4 million, taking the #37 slot in O’Dwyer’s rankings, compared to #42 last year.

President and Partner Lisa Ross said rbb’s healthcare, professional services and travel practices saw year-over-year growth and added several new global brands. The agency also experienced high demand for integrated programs, with more than 40 percent of its clients adding digital or creative projects.

When asked where she sees the industry headed in the next year, Ross’ answer was clear: “Integration, integration, integration.”

“Integration has reached new levels of importance with an increasing number of clients looking for discipline-agnostic strategies that play across all communication sectors from advertising to marketing and digital to public relations. rbb approaches all client programs from an integrated perspective and seeks to develop campaigns that are multi-platform to engage audiences on their preferred channel of communication.”

Ross said clients are searching for products and custom solutions to support brand growth and sales goals. To meet this demand, her agency has created digital storefronts for multi-location clients to review, access and purchase a range of marketing services. Data is now a critical component of marketing for most companies, she said, making insight into real-time client data that allows the agency to make better decisions paramount. Finally, the agency is advising clients to review reputation protection strategies in advance of crisis situations.

Nashville-based healthcare specialist Jar- rard Phillips Cate & Hancock ticked up three spots in the O’Dwyer’s ranking this year to #41, gaining 18.8 percent to nearly $10 million in net fees.

CEO David Jarrard cited two important trends — a transformation of the healthcare industry as well as a growing appreciation from industry leaders for taking a strategic, holistic approach to communications — as factors that accounted for the firm’s double-digit growth last year.

“It’s hard to overstate the disruption underway in healthcare, especially among hospitals and other providers of patient care. Our boutique firm was built from the ground to help these organizations. It’s all we do,” Jarrard said.

Jarrard predicts that the industry will see a continued consolidation of traditional agencies this year, with management consulting firms further competing for strategic communications business and for “smart, data-driven analytics to make us sharper in our work, even as it threatens traditional practices and budgets,” Jarrard said.

Travel, hospitality and luxury lifestyle agency J Public Relations gained 16.6 percent in 2017 to account for $9 million, moving up two positions in the O’Dwyer’s rankings to #47.

J PR Partner Jamie Sigler said the agency has remained focused on the customer experience, growing relationships with existing clients by cultivating their brands through social content and paid digital campaigns.

Sigler also cited the role internal innovation has played in the agency’s success. Agencies get weighed down with busy work, she said, losing site of major results and often leaving teams little breathing room to connect with clients on a meaningful level. And ensuring that those meaningful connections remain sometimes results in turning down work.

“Being tuned into our strengths has helped define our success, and today we’re selective about clients who are in sync with our specificities,” said J PR Partner Sarah Evans. “We say ‘no’ when it’s not the right fit and go all-in when it is.”

While there are more modes of communication today than ever — and unlimited streams of content — Evans believes relationships and face-to-face communication remain paramount. Evans said it’s the job of communicators to understand clients’ business and what’s driving ROI, and to specifically target the people and outlets that make the most impact. “It’s no longer about being everywhere,” Evans said.

“Because of the onslaught of content, I believe that we are going to see more niche firms thrive and become better versed in a singular industry rather than across the board,” Evans said. “We always say at JPR that you can’t be an expert in everything.”

Sigler also noted that experiences remain in demand over material possessions when it comes to messaging in travel PR.

“There’s a desire to be part of a larger community and technology fuels travelers to seize the moment like never before,” Sigler said.

New York’s North 6th Agency, Inc. was #59 in 2018, surging in the O’Dwyer’s rankings from the #71 spot last year with an impressive 38.1 percent gain to $6 million in net fees.

CEO Matt Rizzetta said N6A has invested heavily in its company culture and infrastructure, hiring dedicated department heads for various functions and building ground on a new office in SoHo, which has helped the agency with recruiting. Last year also marked N6A’s first acquisition, purchasing Atlas Communications, a top social media shop in Toronto, which enables the agency to expand into the Toronto market and improve its social media service capabilities.

“All of these investments have supported our strategic growth objectives and positioned us advantageously as we scale to the next level in the coming years,” Rizzetta said.

Rizzetta said that in the next year, he expects to see more agencies of similar size steering away from traditional billable hourly models in favor of models which place premiums on speed, efficiency and measurement. N6A has already invested heavily in building in-house software and proprietary data systems to get ahead of this future trend. Rizzetta also said he’d witnessed no-noticeable growth in various emerging market sectors such as cybersecurity and identity, cannabis, data and analytics, travel and hospitality, recruiting and employment, financial services and cryptocurrencies.

“We believe we are as well-positioned in these areas as any agency of our size, and these will be critical assets for us as we execute on our strategic growth plans in the future,” Rizzetta said.

Beehive Strategic Communication, which specializes in consumer, healthcare, education and professional and financial services, gained 16.6 percent in O’Dwyer’s rankings this year to $3.5 million, taking the #76 slot compared to #79 last year.

Beehive CEO Lisa Hannum said to watch for a surge in purpose-driven strategies from traditional businesses in the coming year, a shift that will likely influence agencies and brands alike. Hannum also believes the growth of in-house agencies will continue. Agencies will increasingly be tapped for high-level thinking that offers brands fresh insights and innovative, creative ideas designed to differentiate, both inside and outside. As a result, agencies need to be prepared to hand off activation and cheer from the sidelines.

“Beehive understands business first, and we move fast, which makes us a valuable partner. The pace of change is accelerating in every industry. Our clients rely on us to navigate change with clarity and then drive action for business growth. Fast,” Hannum said. “Expectations are rising. Employees, partners, customers and communities want to work for and buy from brands that authentically share their beliefs.”

Boston’s Schneider Associates was #78 this year, up 20.2 percent to $3.2 million and gaining four positions in O’Dwyer’s rankings after a bumpy 2016 saw the firm dip 6.3 percent to $2.69 million.

CEO and Founder Joan Schneider told O’Dwyer’s that in addition to attracting more international companies in the private sector, the agency has also expanded its work in the government arena while increasing the number of influencer marketing campaigns and comprehensive marketing integration strategies it does.

Carnett sees the industry becoming even more fragmented over the next year. Early adoption of new technology will be key in providing measurable results to clients and supporting media attribution.

Carnett also sees natural foods, consumer technology and healthcare as some of the PR sectors gaining rapid popularity, and cited education around new markets, such as blockchain and cannabis, and services such as influencer marketing, integration of chatbots and reputation management for products relying on e-commerce sales, as some of the trends we can expect to see gaining traction in the coming year.

14 firms join rankings, regions expand

More than a dozen new agencies joined O’Dwyer’s rankings this year. New to the charts this year are: Matter Communications (#24, $17.1 million, up 3.1 percent), Tonic Life Communications (#35, $12 million, up two percent), Tunheim (#60, $5.7 million, even), Lazar Partners (#63, $5.3 million, up 6.4 percent), Infinite Global (#68, $4.6 million, up 16.9 percent), March Communications (#71, $4 million, up 9.8 percent), Brownstein Group (#88, $2.6 million, even), Stanton Communications (#94, $2.1 million, down 3 percent), Hollywood Agency (#97, $2 million, even), Bellmont Partners (#103, $1.5 million, up 3 percent), Merryman Communications (#110, $1.2 million, up 16.5 percent), RMD Advertising (#113, $1.1 million, up 2.9 percent), Butler Associates (#116, $878,000, down 9.5 percent) and Weiss PR (#121, $573,000, down 6.4 percent).

O’Dwyer’s also ranks firms in 13 key cities/region. The New York area dominated again, with 39 firms either calling New York City home or having a presence there. Top firms are Edelman, Prosek Partners and Hotwire.

The Boston area revealed 13 firms. PAN Communications edged out newly-ranked Matter Communications for the top spot. Racepoint Global is third.

Twenty-five firms covered the Southeast. French | West | Vaughan continued to lead in this region, followed by Jackson Spalding and Edelman in Atlanta.

Twenty-four firms hail from the Midwest, with 14 in Chicago, including chart-topper Edelman. Columbus-based Fahlgen Morton and Minneapolis-based Padilla rounded out the top three Midwest firms.

Firms tracked by the rankings with locations in cities throughout California and Oregon totaled 37 this year, with 21 revealing offices in the San Francisco area and 14 revealing offices in the Los Angeles area. W2O topped the San Francisco chart and Edelman was #1 in L.A. O

Louisiana PR legend Weill dies

Gus Weill, Louisiana PR man, political strategist and writer, died April 13 at a hospice in Baton Rouge. He was 85. Son of a Lafayette mule salesman, Weill opened an advertising agency in Baton Rouge after a three-year stint in the Army.

He worked for Gov. Jimmie Davis and on the Pelican State presidential campaign for John F. Kennedy.

Weill though made his mark while managing the gubernatorial campaign of long-shot candidate John McKeithen, whom he would then serve as Executive Secretary.

He went on to manage gubernatorial races for Edwin Edwards and Dave Treen and mentored the likes of James Carville.

Weill hosted the “Louisiana Legends” public broadcasting series for more than two decades. He wrote plays that ran off and on Broadway and eight novels through “The Cajuns,” which was reviewed as a powerful look at 1950s bayou country.

Weill experienced the loss of son, Gus, Jr., who worked at Edelman and took his own life in 2004. He was 42. Weill is survived by his grandson, Gus Solomon Weill.

Sorrell quits WPP

Martin Sorrell, architect & CEO of WPP, resigned April 14 following the probe launched earlier last month into allegations of his “personal misconduct” and misuse of corporate assets.

Roberto Quarta, Chairman of WPP, moves into the executive chairman slot until a replacement for Sorrell is announced.

Sorrell’s departure wraps up the investigation, “which did not involve amounts that are material,” said a statement from WPP.

Quarta called Sorrell “the driving force behind the expansion of WPP to create the global leader in marketing services.”

Sorrell, via a statement from his crisis PR rep Project Associates, said he’s sad to leave WPP. “It has been a passion, focus and source of energy for so long. However, I believe it is in the best interests of the business if I step down now. I leave the company in very good hands, as the Board knows.”

Andrew Scott, WPP’s Corporate Development Director and Europe COO, and Mark Read, Wunderman CEO, will share the COO role at WPP.

Barker to be talent scout for Edelman

Marie-Claire Barker will become Global Chief Talent Officer at Edelman on July 23 and report to COO Matt Harrington.

She will join from WPP’s Wavemaker, media, content and technology operation where she was talent lead for the 8,500-person firm. Earlier, Barker was Global Talent Officer at Ogilvy & Mather in charge of recruiting, learnings, development and succession planning.

Harrington views Barker’s experience as an “incredible resource” as the PR firm evolves into an integrated marketing organization with expertise in data analytics, paid media, C-suite advisory and digital transformation.

Slavich takes WB publicity post

Michelle Slavich has been named Executive VP, Global Publicity and Strategy, at Warner Bros. Pictures.

Slavich comes to Warner Bros. Pictures from Google, where she most recently served as Head of Entertainment Communications for YouTube.

In the last two years, her team launched over 50 publicity campaigns for YouTube Original series and movies.

Before Google, Slavich was VP, Publicity at Universal Studios Home Entertainment. She began her career at the Shoah Foundation, Steven Spielberg’s nonprofit organization dedicated to the recording of Holocaust survivor testimonies for educational use.

At Warner Bros. Pictures, Slavich will oversee publicity and work proactively with her teams to develop global publicity strategies on all releases from Warner Bros. Pictures and New Line Cinema.
Humor brings B2B firms business opportunities

Some of the most highly regulated and closely scrutinized industries produce the most humorous marketing campaigns, without forfeiting their overall message.

By Tom Faust

Does humor belong in business communications?

If you ask B2B marketers, the answer more often than not will be "no way," or it's "too risky."

Quel dommage.

Using comedy for branding may alienate some customers, partners and/or vendors and spark more trouble than it's worth, so B2B companies can be forgiven for keeping humor at bay when it comes to marketing messages or managing crises.

But, at the same time, a mythology has been constructed that B2B brands should avoid humor in their marketing efforts.

The reality suggests otherwise.

Some of the most highly regulated and closely scrutinized industries also produce some of the most humorous marketing campaigns, without forfeiting their overall message.

Exhibit A: the insurance industry.

Progressive Corp., which offers business insurance policies, has relied on Flo, a fictional character, to get the word out about the company for a decade. Progressive’s ads are light-hearted—silly even—but reinforce the discounted rates that distinguish the insurer from its competitors.

B-to-B giant Cisco Systems also embraces humor to get its message out.

Take Cisco’s marketing campaign designed to promote one of its computer servers. Using all the tropes of coupledom, Cisco developed the campaign to coincide with Valentine’s Day.

The ad features still shots of young couples, as a voiceover intones: “How many ways can a man tell his sweetheart, ‘I love you.’ Until now, the answer was three: He could buy her expensive diamonds; he could take her on a tropical vacation or he could carve his initials into a tree, then carve a heart, then carve her initials.

“But now, he can give her the ultimate expression of his everlasting affection — the Cisco ASR 9000. Because nothing says ‘Forever’ like up to 6.4 terabytes per second, nothing says ‘Commitment’ like up to 400 GPS per slot and nothing says, ‘I love you,’ like six times the Mobile Mac Haul capacity .”

The Cisco ad is illustrative for B-to-B companies and their PR/marketing agencies. The ad touts the major benefits of the product, uses keywords, and never loses sight of brand value or customers’ needs.

By using humor to drive the message, Cisco not only does an effective job of separating itself from the pack, but also makes its message more compelling.

Think about it: B-to-B buyers are constantly inundated by ads and messages with a somber if not funeral tone. Depending on the brand, B-to-B messaging may even try and shame people into purchasing their product to ensure their business’s future.

There’s only so much serious information people can take before their eyes start to glaze over.

As traditional methods of communicating with business customers are upended, perhaps b-to-b marketers should think about how they can appeal to the funny bone instead.

All the product-driven messaging in the world is no match for delivering a message that makes B-to-B buyers laugh and bringing some levity to their hectic schedules. They’ll remember a funny message the next time their purchasing cycle begins anew.

However, before taking this step, Job One is to make sure the brand of humor syncs up with brand attributes. It’s also important that employees are on board with the effort, because they’re the ones who will be asked about it, and may have to defend it.

Run a beta campaign by some media savvy employees and see if it resonates with them or falls flat. Go backward and determine where the campaign might backfire with the market.

When ready to allocate budget for a humorous campaign, brand managers should also keep these three tips in mind.

Make sure the audience shares in the humor. There’s nothing like an attempt at humor turning into the communications equivalent of crickets chirping. When talking a humorous approach to marketing, brainstorm carefully. Bring in top sales reps to get a sharper sense of what makes customers tick. Don’t get too far afield from your audience. Make sure the humor deployed doesn’t turn into a head-scratcher for customers. The audience needs to be in on the joke.

Don’t get too edgy. In order to work effectively, the humor deployed in communications must harmonize with the audience and connect with the company’s overall values. It’s a fine line between humor and inane.

Be (slightly) self-deprecating. People are drawn to companies that can laugh at themselves and still send a strong message. B-to-B brands are no exception. The message needs to convey the benefits of the products and services being sold, of course. But by taking a humorous approach, companies demonstrate to consumers that they are good people to work with and are not all about the sale. That makes people feel good when they think about your company, which is the coin of the realm.

By taking humor more seriously, B-to-B marketers have a better shot at cutting through the proverbial and growing clutter online, and to connect more closely with customers and prospects who are less and less beholden to individual companies. Don’t laugh. It works.

Tom Faust is Managing Director of Stanton.

Most online forms go uncompleted

A survey by The Manifest revealed that 81 percent of respondents admitted to clicking away from an online form recently and never returning to complete it.

The main reasons for doing so: form length and concerns surrounding online security. The survey found that more than a quarter of respondents — 27 percent — said they ditched an online form because it was too long, and slightly more — 29 percent — cited security worries. 11 percent said advertisements or upselling compelled them to leave, and 10 percent said they’d been provoked to abandon the process because of unnecessary questions.

The survey also suggested that once someone leaves a form, they’re not likely to return to it. 67 percent said they abandon the process entirely after quitting the form, compared to only 20 percent who admitted following up with the company later.

A majority of those polled — 67 percent — said they’d filled out at least one online form within the past week.

Bateman Group is a content-led PR agency focused on helping technology companies at every stage make a positive impact on the way we live and work. We believe crafting these stories requires a different way of thinking about PR and an exceptional team capable of delivering on its powerful possibilities. We’re distinguished by our people-first culture and progressive workplace policies, allowing us to maintain one of the highest employee retention averages in the industry — 90 percent on average since inception.

Bateman Group has a very well-defined, distinctive company culture. The agency’s motto is “Invest in Team First” — in other words, to deliver exceptional client service and award-winning work, the agency first must invest in its people. While fast growth often comes at the cost of employee turnover, Bateman Group has grown an average of 33 percent for the last three years with an average employee retention rate of 90 percent among the highest in the industry.

Creating wins for clients facing public opposition and major crises for 35 years.

Davies is a full-service strategic and crisis communications agency that employs insightful public opinion research to craft thought-provoking materials that share client stories. We uncover and motivate vocal public support, soothe crisis and thwart opposition through hands-on community activation and thoughtful strategy.

Davies delivers the power of public support for clients engaged in local, state, and federal environmental regulatory permitting battles and land use entitlement challenges.

When trouble strikes, Davies manages crisis response with focused management, message-driven communications and strategic planning that calms the media and public storm.

One Agency, Two Specialized Practice Areas. Established in 1960, Development Counsellors International (DCI) focuses exclusively on economic development and tourism marketing. During the last half century, we have worked with more than 500 cities, regions, states, provinces and countries to help them attract business investment, visitors and talent. Experts in economic development marketing and lead generation, DCI knows how to elevate your community’s image, increase project inquiries and help you create new investment opportunities and good jobs for your citizens. Our tourism marketing team partners with destinations to increase leisure, corporate and association visitor arrivals and spending. How? By winning the support of key influencers in media, digital influencers, meeting planners and the travel trade. Our goal always? Combine smart strategy with the right tactics to deliver powerful results.

DCI is globally connected through TAAN Worldwide, a network of 46 agencies in 29 countries.

Doug Wright, Senior Account Director

Feintuch Communications is an award-winning boutique strategic relations firm offering senior counsel, experience and tactical support to a broad range of organizations — from the Fortune 500 to emerging companies, non-profits and associations.

We focus on delivering business results — helping our clients build distribution, sell more products or services, improve their corporate or brand image and achieve other business outcomes. And every client engagement is managed — hands-on — by a senior practitioner who is responsible for results. We provide clients with an integrated blend of public relations, social media, advertising/marketing, investor relations, web/digital marketing and other services. Strategic practice areas include technology; financial services, fintech; AV; energy and clean tech; media and marketing; and professional services.

In our delivery of sophisticated public relations services, we focus on specific needs — such as media relations, new product launches, corporate identity and branding — as well as broader-based initiatives including industry analyst campaigns, trade and consumer outreach, social media programs, awards and honors programs, speaking platforms and association marketing.

We serve on the board and are a partner in PR World Alliance (www.PRWorldAlliance.com), a global partnership of premier independent communications consultancies.

Our goal is to provide the expert service, experienced counsel and hands-on support that our clients need to meet their business objectives. Our commitment is to be a superior business partner in each and every client engagement.

Clients include: BorderX Lab, BasisCode, HDMI Licensing Administrator, Healbe, Klarna, Leflencé, Legrand, LifeThreads, MPOWER Financing and ZeeVee.
employs more than 100 public relations, public affairs, social media, advertising and digital marketing experts between its Raleigh, N.C., headquarters and New York City, Los Angeles and Tampa offices.

In addition to ranking FWV #14 nationally, O'Dwyer’s placed FWV #1 in the Southeast, a position it has occupied for more than 15 years. Among the top agencies, FWV ranks second in both Beauty/Fashion and Sports Marketing, fourth in Entertainment Marketing and eighth in Agricultural Marketing. The agency’s work in Food & Beverage, Home Furnishings, Professional Services, Travel/Tourism and Economic Development, and Environmental/Public Affairs also earned category rankings in the top 20.

Over two decades, FWV has represented iconic brands like Wrangler, Coca-Cola, Jack Daniels, Slim Jim, Justin Boots, Pendleton Whisky, Volvo Trucks and many others, as well as the Greater Raleigh Convention & Visitors Bureau, Bassett Furniture, Saft, ABB and Teen Cancer America.

At Greenough Brand Storytellers, client satisfaction is our top priority. Great storytelling starts with a boundaryless connection between brand and agency team, and this is measurable. In 2017, we once again scored a near perfect 10 for being “extensions” of clients’ teams. 100 percent of those same clients surveyed said they’d recommend us to others.

Great storytelling is also evident in outcomes. Our client successes begin with “Brand Journalism,” our approach to sourcing, developing and distributing authentic stories. We’re a client’s in-house investigative reporting team, presenting industry trends and issues through stories that engage instead of sell — and we earn results for clients through consistent media coverage. We also tap owned and paid channels with integrated marketing programs that turn great stories into opportunities to engage, build audience affinity and generate leads. Our campaigns more effectively engage viewers, readers and listeners, and this makes them think, share and take meaningful action.

At Greenough Brand Storytellers in Watertown, Mass., client satisfaction is a top priority. The team believes great storytelling starts with a boundaryless connection between brand and agency team.
Hemsworth Communications launched the first-ever luxury hotel in space, Orion Span’s Aurora Station, earlier this year. The agency generated more than 1,000 media placements around the world within 72 hours, including feature stories in Robb Report, Conde Nast Traveler, CNN Travel, Fast Company, Space.com, AFAR, World News Tonight with David Muir, BBC and more.

Defining communications broadly to include digital, content marketing, thought leadership as well as traditional PR, The Hoffman Agency knows how to differentiate brands and deliver air cover for sales. With heritage in the technology sector, the firm’s work today cuts across a range of industries.

While campaigns vary by client and industry, all share one theme: the creation of content that reflects the tenets of storytelling. This means developing narratives that prompt journalists to write and target audiences to read — a far cry from the “corporate speak” that satisfies internal stakeholders. Toward this end, the firm conducts storytelling workshops for internal communicators, executives and employees.

For clients with global needs, the company operates in Asia Pacific, Europe and the United States. Unlike traditional agencies handicapped by their silo structure, The Hoffman Agency applies a collaborative approach to implementing multi-country campaigns. This leverage of content and thinking across geographies ultimately generates better results.

At Hollywood Agency, we make brands famous. Creativity, culture and content drive us to ignite products, services and ideas that are changing the game. Believing that strategy and creativity should work harmoniously, Hollywood’s integrated services include social media, media and influencer relations, content creation, events, creative/digital services, and reputation management.

Ours is a serious business we conduct with earnest fun, because campaigns are rooted in imagination and nothing stifles imagination like severity in approach or sterility of mindset. An independent boutique in practice and principle, being on our own has never stopped us from having a big impact.

We don’t get excited about monotony. That’s why we maintain an eclectic mix of clients. We’ve immersed ourselves in the nuances of food, fragrances, education, consumer technology, financial services, and a broad spectrum of B2B endeavors. We’re proud to call the following brands clients: Samsonite, Fine Cooking, TOMY International, HBX, The Edge Fitness Clubs, Secure Circle, and Fusion Worldwide.

At JPA Health Communications, we share our clients’ commitment to making people healthier. Some might say we are obsessed with improving and protecting lives.

This ideology inspires our work. It pushes us to combine data and heart to go deeper and see beyond the obvious. It drives sophistication and creativity to solve complex problems.

JPA’s exclusive focus on health means that our biotech/pharma, device and diagnostics, provider and nonprofit clients can count on a team with experience and perspective to deliver results. We generate positive media coverage through carefully cultivated relationships. Our influencer relations model uses a proprietary, targeted approach to reach the stakeholders who drive change and engage others within their reach.

JPA is an independent, full-service communications agency. We are proud of the award-winning work we get to do every day. We invite you to learn more by contacting one of our offices: Washington, DC, Boston, and London.

Julie Karbo, Founder & CEO

Karbo Communications is a respected and innovative PR and digital marketing agency that delivers on clients’ business objectives. The firm’s track record of helping companies boost sales and out-perform formidable competitors draws promising and prestigious clients from around the world. Karbo Com’s services combine perennially successful and inventive PR programs with the newest growth hacking solutions. A varied and multi-talented team synthesizes the worlds of PR, journalism and digital marketing — with a Silicon Valley ethos. The resulting services reflect Karbo Com’s ever evolving view of what agencies can do to help their clients. Unlike most agencies, Karbo Com ensures client teams are always led by senior team members on a day-to-day basis. With Karbo Com, you don’t get bench players. You get the industry’s top marketing and PR teams working with you every day, whether it’s developing positioning, placing your company in top media, growing an active social media base, securing thought leadership, executing eblasts and SEM campaigns or writing content that contributes to your bottom line. Karbo has ushered in technologies such as the cloud, SaaS, the Internet of Things, artificial intelligence, big data, mobile, advertising tech, security, networking, augmented reality and wearable technology. When it’s make or break, you want the best. You want a team that’s seen it all, yet knows the latest and greatest trends, technologies and tools. At Karbo Com, we have a track record of delivering revenues, industry leading stature, partners and funding.

The Karbo Com team has worked extensively with both B2B and consumer tech companies ranging from small startups to global, billion dollar brands including Apple, eBay, Active.com, the IoT World Conference, Equinix, Cisco, Defense.Net, NerdWallet, GoDaddy, National Geographic, Oracle and Intel.

Rosica Communications is an integrated PR and online marketing company that promotes and protects companies, brands and people. Founded in 1980, the firm serves a diverse healthcare, B2B, nonprofit, consumer products, food and beverage and corporate clientele. Our PR and communications capabilities include positioning and messaging, thought leadership, media relations, social media management, influencer marketing, crisis communications, content marketing, corporate communications, cause marketing, direct marketing, and media training. Rosica’s social media services include strategy, management, branding, content development and optimization, and follower acquisition. Our online marketing team, based in New Windsor, NY, is a Google Certified Partner and specializes in SEO, online reputation, reviews management, online advertising (PPC and social ads), website development, and WordPress security.

As a “thinking partner” focused on achieving our clients’ objectives, Rosica creates and executes thought leadership programs with clearly defined KPIs/metrics. We craft compelling, authentic stories and messaging then effectively disseminate our client-partners’ good news while supporting their sales and communications goals.

In 2017, Rosica formed a joint venture with New York City-based Feintuch Communications, which specializes in Tech PR, analyst relations and investor relations.

Our process includes:
• Strategically identifying our clients’ business and marketing goals/objectives
• Identifying target audiences, influencers and key opinion leaders
• Honing the positioning, story and key messages, tailoring messages to each audience
• Developing measurable, integrated and creative PR, social media and internal/external communications programs
• Proactively communicating with clients
• Aggressively securing results, evaluating against pre-determined strategic objectives
• Repurposing and leveraging content and PR coverage to augment SEO, sales activities, online reputation, tradeshow marketing, analyst relations, and direct marketing.

Outcome-Driven. Beyond services, industry practices and even results, come to us if you have a specific outcome you’re trying to achieve. We’ll use our reputation marketing suite of services — public relations, digital/social marketing, demand generation and creative services — to deliver. We feature four — Thought Leadership, Growth, Engagement and Valuation. And yes, there are nuances to each of these, but most of our clients land on one of those outcomes as part of their strategic objective. Have your own outcome, great. Serve it up and we’ll give you our honest take on whether we can achieve it. Beyond outcomes, we connect with clients whose leadership aligns with one or more of our market focuses — Disruptive Forces, Category Pioneers, Stealth Leaders and Wonder Women. So ask yourself, do you have a story to tell along these lines. If so, then we already connected on a more meaningful level than the superficial service and experience criteria.

As far as the experience goes, we have seven practices, six ranked nationally — technology, health, financial services, food & beverage, lifestyle and environment. Franchising, the agency’s seventh practice, is in an unranked category, but it has featured brands such as TCBY, Johnny Rockets, Corner Bakery Café and Moe’s Southwest Grill. Based in Atlanta’s urban westside, the firm operates Groovy Studios, a creative arm that offers graphic design, web services, content development and brand identity. Since its inception, Groovy Studios has received more than 45 creative awards. It owns and runs the Winepreneurs.Club, an initiative that brings together entrepreneurs and small batch winemakers to sip, taste and connect. The firm’s Start-Opia platform houses its technology and entrepreneur endeavors that establish it as a first mover in the region with support for Atlanta Tech Village, Atlanta Tech Angels, Tech Alpharetta, Keiretsu Forum, Launch Pad2X and Raise Forum.

Client work features a mix of publicly traded, middle market and startup companies, including Atlanta Tech Village, Belgard, Biocent, Carvana, Ciox, Discovery Point, Factor Trust/TransUnion, Interface, Monkey Joe’s, Sakrete, SitA, SOC Telemed and Stretch Zone.

Founded in 2008, Weiss PR, Inc. helps businesses and non-profit organizations reach, engage, and influence the right audiences to achieve their communications and business objectives.

By focusing in B2B tech and professional services companies, Walker Sands has helped hundreds of leading B2B brands build brand awareness, establish marketplace credibility and drive demand that converts to leads. In the 17 years since our founding, we’ve cultivated a culture that prioritizes collaboration and prioritizes excellence in integrating PR and digital marketing.

WEISS PR

Weiss PR’s clients are concentrated in five industry sectors: commercial real estate (including architecture, construction, development, and engineering); employee benefits and healthcare; non-profits; professional services; and technology. In addition, the firm has extensive experience in crisis communications, including strategy development and rapid response implementation for both corporations and individuals.

In spite of its rapid growth and assignments throughout the U.S. and internationally (including clients in New Zealand, Australia, Canada, and Iceland, and work throughout Europe and the Middle East), Weiss PR has stayed true to its vision to provide clients with ideas built on strategy — not egos — from a team of senior public relations professionals who are committed to providing exceptional service, great work, and measurable results.

Starbucks surrenders the store

By Fraser Seitel

Public relations professionals, college professors and social justice advocates of every stripe have universally commended the management of Starbucks for its fast and decisive action after two African Americans were arrested at a store in Philadelphia.

To be sure, the situation, whose viral video quickly elevated the incident into a national crisis, demanded the kind of speedy action that Starbucks took, but I wouldn't be so fast in hoisting the celebratory Mocha Cookie Crumble Frappacino.

Starbucks' spur-of-the-moment decision to acquiesce completely to mob demands may likely backfire on the company, its employees and shareholders.

First, a review of the situation. Two 23-year-old African-American men at Starbucks, waiting for another man to discuss "real estate opportunities," asked to use the restroom.

The store manager replied that restrooms were for paying customers only, and if the men bought something — perhaps a cup of coffee — they could use the facilities. The men refused and sat down at a table.

Shortly thereafter, the manager called the Philly cops, who arrived, handcuffed the men and led them out of the store.

Second, prejudice on the basis of race or sex or religion or whatever is always wrong. So, if these two were arrested because they were black, then they were clearly discriminated against and those responsible should apologize and attempt to undo the wrong that was committed.

Third, the immediate condemnation of the incident by Starbucks new CEO Kevin Johnson was the right thing to do. The arrest of the two African-American men was wrong. Handcuffing them was even worse. And they deserved, as CEO Johnson said, an apology from all concerned, because racial profiling and discrimination are always wrong.

But fourth, when Johnson and Starbucks founder Howard Schultz rushed to blame the entire thing on the company in general and the Philadelphia store manager in particular, they set the company up for a raging, long-lasting public relations disaster.

Here's what they did wrong.

Starbucks rushed to judgment

Johnson followed up his statement of condemnation by rushing cross-country from Starbucks' Seattle headquarters to Philadelphia to apologize personally to the two men.

In so doing, he was tacitly admitting the company's — and the manager's — guilt.

But wait a minute: all the manager did was call the local police, fearing a potential disruption. It was the cops who quickly decided to snap the handcuffs on the presumed perpetrators. As one of the men put it, as soon as the police arrived, "they just said you have to leave."

In other words, it was the Philadelphia police, not Starbucks local management, that aggravatated the situation. The next day, the Philadelphia police chief publicly apologized for the uncalled-for action taken by his subordinates.

But since the Starbucks CEO was so quick to assume blame, most observers followed suit and blamed the company rather than the real culprits, the Philadelphia police.

Starbucks abandoned its employees instead of facing up to its management policy failure.

The only casualty in the crisis — beyond Starbucks' reputation — was the manager of the store who sought police assistance. The poor woman who made the decision, according to Starbucks, "no longer works at the company."

She was tossed overboard in an immediate gesture to calm the gathering mob of racial activists and local protestors descending on the Philadelphia store.

But what did the woman do wrong? Starbucks' policy on loitering without buying anything is notoriously inconsistent. Some stores encourage students and others to "hang," as a safe place to relax. Other stores are more rigorous in their insistence that the precious few tables — not to mention the coveted restrooms — be occupied only by paying customers.

So, this poor manager was properly confused, because Starbucks' management has never dictated consistent policy. Rather than acknowledging its failures, management chose to behead its manager as a convenient scapegoat.

The message for a future Starbucks' manager faced with a similar situation is clear: management won't have your back. That can't be good for employee relations.

Starbucks caved to the rabble rousers

As BlackLivesMatter activists and #Boycott Starbucks hashtags gathered momentum from the sudden crisis, Starbucks' management panicked.

To stem the onslaught, the company announced a national day of racial training for all 8,000 Starbucks stores across the U.S. On May 29, Starbucks will close all stores and deliver racial sensitivity training to all 175,000 workers.

Rarely in the annals of American corporate culture has a dumber idea been hatched; it's even doper than Starbucks' ill-fated 2015 "Race Together" campaign to "start a dialogue about race."

While most acknowledged that one day of sensitivity training likely wouldn't do much to leave a lasting impression on anybody, the real tragedy of the one-day closing was perpetrated on Starbucks' shareholders.

The cost of the transparent Hail Mary publicity attempt in lost Starbucks' revenues: $12 million.

The message to investors contemplating an investment in such a weak-backed company: beware.

Starbucks invited schemers

While CEO Johnson's well-meaning but costly attempts to smooth the situation were costly enough, it was left to the company's perpetually do-gooding founder Howard Schultz, creator of the "Race Together" fiasco, to deliver the final counterproductive coup de grace.

These two men, Schultz told CBS, deserved to be listened to. And he vowed that Starbucks would try to work with them, perhaps on real estate opportunities or even as company franchisees.

In other words, because law enforcement screwed up after a Starbucks manager sought help in reconciling confusing management policy, Howie Schultz was opening the company's coffers to anybody who might air a similar grievance.

One could only imagine the rush to Starbucks of every gold-seeking con man eager to take advantage of the world's squishiest management.

The bet here is that once the universal admiration dies down, Starbucks' knee-jerk, public relations response to its racial crisis will be assessed for what is was: a failure for its employees, its stockholders and the company itself.
Investing in real estate

By Richard Goldstein

Many of my clients are investing in real estate, but most don’t understand the tax rules that go along with the investment. The motivation for making this investment varies, but for the most part, it’s appreciation and cash flow.

A real estate investment can be as simple as a vacation home or rental property. Rental property can be, for example, a multi-family dwelling or a property that’s rented to the taxpayer’s business (there are separate rules for this not discussed in this column).

Before going any further, there’s one basic rule that must be understood. For the most part, a trade or business that the taxpayer doesn’t materially participate in is considered a “passive activity.” This means that the taxpayer may not deduct passive activity losses against non-passive activity income. Assume a PR professional operates a small PR agency that earns $200,000. The same PR professional also invested in another business that he or she does not actively participate in. This business lost $200,000. This loss of $200,000 cannot offset the income earned by the active business. Therefore, the loss is suspended!

Unfortunately, rental real estate activities are considered passive activities, even if the property owner does materially participate in the rental activity. (There are exceptions to this rule however.) Therefore, the real estate loss cannot offset the income earned by the PR agency.

Passive activity income and losses

It matters not how real estate is owned. You can purchase property directly or make an investment in an S corporation, partnership or limited liability company. If the real estate activities generate operating income, this income is taxed as ordinary income. If the activities generate a loss, these losses must clear three hurdles before they can be deducted: tax basis, at-risk and passive loss limits.

Without getting into too much detail, the tax basis hurdle is simple: it limits the loss deduction to your tax basis in the property. Therefore, if you purchase real estate for $2.0 million free and clear your tax basis is $2.0 million.

If, on the other hand, you purchase the same property for $2.0 million and secure a $1.5 million mortgage, you need to clear the at-risk rule. Your tax basis is still $2.0 million assuming you’re at-risk for the mortgage. Therefore, if the property generates a $100,000 loss, you have the potential to deduct the $100,000 loss. If, on the other hand, the loan to purchase the property is non-recourse, you have no economic risk other than for the $500,000 down payment. Once you get by these two hurdles, the passive activity loss rules must be satisfied as discussed above. Remembering that real estate activities are considered “passive” not active activities, a taxpayer must pass one of a series of tests to be considered materially participating in the activity. If you make a direct investment in real estate the material participation requirement is simple to pass. If you are one of 50 other investors in a real estate partnership, the likelihood is you will not pass the material participation requirement.

Accordingly, if your share of the real estate activity loss is $50,000, you will not be able to deduct this loss unless you have other passive activities that generate passive income. There’s an exception to this rule in the year you sell or otherwise dispose of the property and that’s not discussed in this column.

Rental real estate exception

Small landlords with modified adjusted gross income under $150,000 ($75,000 if married filing separately) will be able to deduct the loss against non-passive sources of income. Under this exception, you can deduct up to $25,000 of rental losses from your non-passive income, such as wages, dividends and interest. If your Modified Adjusted Gross Income exceeds $100,000 ($50,000 for married filing separately) the $25,000 deduction ($12,500 for married filing separately) is reduced by 50 percent of each dollar over $100,000. ($50,000 for married filing separately). Once your MAGI reaches $150,000, the $25,000 deduction is eliminated.

Real estate professionals

Let’s say you are year employed or own a PR agency. Let’s further assume your average work year is 2,000 hours, and you also work 752 hours managing your properties. Over the years, you’ve purchased real estate and now you own and manage six properties. You’re familiar with the tax rules concerning real estate. However, a friend told you that you’re a “real estate professional” and the passive activity loss rules don’t apply to you. You make an appointment with your tax advisor and ask why you were never considered a real estate professional?

The simple answer is you just do not qualify! True, income and losses arising from any rental activity are generally considered passive. One exception to this rule applies to real estate professionals. If you qualify as a real estate professional, the rental real estate activity escapes the per se rule otherwise applicable to a rental activity.

So, can a PR professional qualify as a real estate professional? It’s difficult and, yes, maybe even impossible!

To be a real estate professional, a PR pro must provide more than one-half of his or her total professional services in real property trades or business in which he or she materially participates and performs more than 750 hours of services during the tax year in real property trade or businesses. For purposes of determining if you’re a real estate professional, your material participation is determined separately for each property unless an election is made to treat all interests as a single rental activity.

Getting to the math. Our PR pro worked 752 hours and passed the more than 750-hour test. However, 2,000 hours plus 752 hours is 2,752 hours divided by two is 1,376 hours. Our PR professional worked 752 and therefore failed the test. Play with the numbers; unless your primary business is real estate, it’s extremely difficult to pass this test.

PR news brief

KCSA courts cannabis crowd

KCSA Strategic Communications is expanding its presence in the growing cannabis industry with the acquisition of Salar Media Group, which specializes in the sector. Salar founder and CEO Cynthia Salarizadeh is joining KCSA as a managing partner.

The New York-based firm’s move comes as the trend toward legal marijuana intensifies nationwide. In addition to Washington, D.C., Alaska, California, Colorado, Maine, Massachusetts, Nevada, Oregon, Vermont and Washington State all have legalized the recreational use of marijuana. According to the National Conference of State Legislatures, 44 states have some form of legal marijuana, ranging from adult recreational use to medical use to “limited medical” use in several states allowing “cannabis extracts.”

Salar Media Group has represented brands that include cannabis tracking software company BioTrackThc, Humboldt’s Finest and Julu Royal, the cannabis brand launched by Julian Marley, son of late Reggae star Bob Marley.

KCSA’s cannabis practice works for such clients as cannabis-focused agriculture company Terra Tech, cannabis oil and solution provider Golden Leaf Holdings and Viridian Capital Advisors, a strategic and financial advisory firm dedicated to the cannabis industry.
Dept. of Homeland Security to track journos

The Department of Homeland Security has plans to create a “media influencer database” that it says will track over 290,000 global news sources.

According to documents issued by DHS in April, the Department is looking for a contractor who can monitor “any or all media coverage related to the Department of Homeland Security or a particular event.” The scope of the database is to include online, print, broadcast, cable, radio, and trade and industry publications, as well as international media outlets.

In addition to tracking media content, the database would compile information on the people who produce that content. DHS says potential contractors should be able to “present contact details and any other information that could be relevant, including publications that this influencer writes for, and an overview of the previous coverage published by the media influencer.”

The proposed database, which would also gather data on social media conversations, would analyze statements in terms of “sentiment” as well as content.

While DHS says it has “a critical need to incorporate these functions into their programs in order to better reach Federal, state, local, tribal and private partners,” it has not been forthcoming about exactly what kind of uses the information gathered would be put to, or as regards what, if any, limits would be put on the gathering of that information.

Ex-de Blasio press secretary re-launches firm

Karen Hinton, who was press secretary for New York Mayor Bill de Blasio, has re-launched her firm to focus on issues such as environmental protection, affordable housing and employment opportunities for low-income individuals.

Most recently chief strategy officer at Fenton, Hinton handled de Blasio’s messaging, branding and oversight of a ten-person staff.

Before joining de Blasio’s team, she ran Hinton Communications and was senior advisor to former Housing and Urban Affairs Secretary and current New York Governor Andrew Cuomo.

Hinton represents Business Network for Offshore Wind, Nonhuman Rights Project, National Community Reinvestment Coalition and the Amazon Defense Coalition.

Dept. of Agriculture alum joins Edelman

Darci Vetter, who was Deputy Secretary at the Dept. of Agriculture, has joined Edelman in D.C. as general manager of PA.

She’ll be vice chair in its agriculture, food and trade group to support clients in the commodities, supply chain, agribusiness and global trade sectors.

Vetter also served as chief agricultural negotiator in the Office of the US Trade Representative, where she worked on the Trans-Pacific Partnership Trade Agreement.

APCO handles Global Citizen

APCO Worldwide has signed on to represent New York-based Global Citizen, the nonprofit dedicated to eradicating extreme poverty by 2030.

The GC platform relies on social action such as events, content, partnerships and grassroots organizing to generate funds.

Its high-profile Global Citizen Festival held last September in Central Park featured performances by The Killers, Steven Wonder, The Lumineers and The Chainsmokers.

The organization claims to have received financial commitments of $35 billion since 2012, of which $10 billion of the amount has been disbursed for food/hunger, sanitation, healthcare and educational programs.

APCO’s work involves support for maintaining spending on development aid. Jerri Ann Henry leads that effort.

Gunshot detection group sets sights on Washington

Burson-Marsteller’s Prime Policy Group has been hired by gun technology company ShotSpotter, Inc. to advocate law enforcement funding issues on Capitol Hill.

Newark, CA-based ShotSpotter, which was founded in 1995, utilizes a technology that detects the location of gunfire activity through a series of sound sensors placed on area rooftops, then alerts area law enforcement agencies when shootings occur. The service, which law enforcement agencies pay an annual subscription to use, is intended to help officers respond to shootings more quickly and to provide them with local gunfire data, thereby reducing incidents of gun violence.

The New York Police Department began using the technology two years ago. Law enforcement agencies in more than 90 cities — including Chicago, Los Angeles, Washington, D.C., Boston, San Francisco and Minneapolis — have adopted the technology as well.

According to lobbying registration documents filed in April, PPG has been hired by ShotSpotter to monitor federal assistance to local U.S. law enforcement agencies.

A seven-person team at the government and public affairs firm leads the account, including PPG chairman Charles Black, who ran all of Ronald Reagan’s presidential campaigns and also served as an adviser to the election campaigns of George H.W. Bush, Senator John McCain and Governors Mitt Romney and John Kasich.

WPP is Prime Policy Group’s parent company.
UAE hires H+K for energy bash

The United Arab Emirates has hired Hill+Knowlton Strategies to handle strategic communications and global PR for the World Energy Council’s 24th World Energy Congress slated for 2019 (Sept. 9-12) at the Abu Dhabi National Exhibition Center. The Congress, headlined “Energy for Prosperity,” will attract heads of state, energy executives, community leaders and members of academia who will discuss the “energy trilemma” of security, equity and environment sustainability.

Abu Dhabi won the bidding to host the 2019 Congress in 2014. H+K’s offices in Abu Dhabi, Dubai and London will begin their PR work by showcasing the planning and progress made to put on the event. The WPP unit will promote a flurry of announcements leading up to the Congress and conduct outreach to leading influencers in the energy sector.

The London-based World Energy Council has more than 3,000-member organizations in 90 countries.

Mercury consults Kazakhstan

Mercury Public Affairs has inked a three-month, $90,000 pact to lend consulting and management services for the Republic of Kazakhstan’s Ministry of Justice.

The public affairs and strategy shop will provide strategic consulting and management services to the central Asian country in areas of lobbying, government relations and issues management, according to Foreign Agents Registration Act documents filed with the Justice Department in April.

Mercury will be an independent subcontractor on behalf of U.S. law firm Latham & Watkins, with whom there is a direct contractual relationship, while the work will be funded and performed under the direction and supervision of Kazakhstan’s Ministry of Justice.

The oil-rich former Soviet Union state is Central Asia’s top economy, generating 60 percent of the region’s GDP, primarily through its booming oil and gas industry.

The $30,000 per-month pact terminates in June.

Omnicom is Mercury’s parent company.

ThirdCircle pitches Morocco as film mecca

The Embassy of Morocco has hired ThirdCircle Inc. to a $480,000 one-year pact to promote film production in the Kingdom.

The agreement calls for TC to arrange visits by American film and TV producers to Morocco and provide opportunities for Moroccan producers to meet with studio executives in the US.

TC also will pitch the northwest African nation as a golf mecca and arrange for FAM trips there by golf pros, enthusiasts and media people from outlets such as the Golf Channel.

It will craft an outreach program and “engage in meaningful dialogue with various stakeholder and ethnic/issue-oriented groups across a range of issues from culture to economics,” according to its statement of work with the Embassy.
